Preface.

Acallam na Senórach, 'the Colloquy with the Ancient Men', is, next to the Táin bó Cualṅgi, the longest prose composition of the mediaeval Irish. Like the Pañcatantra, the Decameron and The Thousand and one Nights, the Acallam is what Germans call a rahmenerzählung, that is to say, it cousists of a number of stories enclosed in the framework of a single narrative. The framing story, in the present case, tells how the two old heroes, Ossian and Cáilte, and their twice nine followers[1]), surviving the ruinous battles of Comar, Gabra and Ollarba[2]), meet with St. Patrick, and how Cáilte wanders with him over Ireland, recounting legends connected with the hills, forts, woods, lakes, fords, wells, cairns and so forth, to which they come. Most of these legends relate to Find and the deeds of the Fiann[3]). But the story of the Fort of Lugaid Menn's sons, pp. 11—14, the story of Cormac Cass, p. 33, the pathetic account of the deaths of Fithir and Dárine, p. 117, belong to other cycles of romance. And the framing narrative contains some [1]) Three enneads are mentioned in ll. 7896, 7906: so there seem to have been nine other followers, who subsequently joined Cáilte. For the numbers nine and three, see infra, pp. 342, 346.

[2]) This battle was (according to the Four Masters) fought A. D. 285. Patrick's advent was, according to the same authorities, in the year 432. So that the Fiann who met him must have been nearly 200 years old. See note on l. 524, as to the fabulous longevity of heathen heroes.

episodes, such as the escape and recognition of the prince who had been carried off by elves (pp. 125, 134), and the love-tale of Aillenn and the king of Connaught (pp. 176, 219), which have nothing to do with Find and his warlike hunters.

The mss. upon which the present edition is based are four in number, three of the fifteenth century, one of the sixteenth, all on parchment[4]), and all more or less imperfect.

I. Laud 610. This ms. belongs to the Bodleian library. It has been described by Todd[1]), O' Donovan[2]) and Zimmer[3]). The fragments of the Acallam which it contains begin at fo. 123 and end with fo. 146. The first fragment corresponds with lines 2044—2235 of the following text: the second with ll. 2400—3520: the third with ll. 3723—3909: the fourth with ll. 4078—7356: the fifth with ll. 7398—7546: the sixth with ll. 7597—7986, where it ends imperfectly. The Laud fragments, being older and better than the others, are here printed in extenso. But all the important various readings of the other mss. are given in the notes.

II. Rawlinson B. 487 also belongs to the Bodleian. This ms. has been described by Macray and d'Arbois de Jubainville. It contains four fragments of the Acallam. The first page is illegible. The first legible fragment begins at fo. 13ᵃ, and corresponds with ll. 187—680 of the following text. The second fragment corresponds with ll. 780—1361: the third with ll. 1659—4139: the four with ll. 4519—6579, where this copy ends imperfectly. It omits many of the poems.

III. The Book of Lismore. This ms., now in the possession

[3]) Gött. Gel. Anz. 1887, ss. 190—193.

[4]) The fragmentary paper mss. of the Acallam which I have examined in the British Museum are worthless, meo quidem iudicio. The six folios in the Bibliothèque Mazarine (Rev. Celt. XI 427), numbered 3075, and written in 1760, may possibly deserve attention. I have not seen them.

of the Duke of Devonshire, has been fully described in the preface to Lives of Saints from the Book of Lismore, Oxford, 1890. The ten fragments of the Acallam which it contains are in ff. 159—197. The first fragment corresponds with ll, 1—3975: the second with ll. 4078—5639: the third with ll. 5940—6096: the fourth with ll. 6400—6446: the fifth with ll. 6494—6625: the sixth with ll. 6954—7125: the seventh with ll. 7138—7356: the eighth with ll. 7398—7546: the ninth with ll. 7565—7596: the tenth with ll. 7883—8005.

Lines 1—2043, 2236—2400, 3521—3717, 3910—3975, 7565—7596, 7986—8005, not being in Laud 610, are printed infra.

The Lismore fragments have been edited in Silva Gadelica, London 1892, pp. 94—233, with lamentable inaccuracy. In the Revue Celtique XIV 329—331, XV 372—382, Kuno Meyer has mentioned some of the textual errors in this edition. I collated it carefully with the Book of Lismore, and it is not too much to say that, of the 3260 lines (or thereabouts) which it contains, hardly a single line correctly represents the ms. though many of the deviations, such as the bisection of compound verbs, and the wrong omission or insertion of marks of length or marks of aspiration, are comparatively unimportant. On the other hand, the translation given in vol. II, pp. 101—265 deserves high praise. So excellent is it, on the whole[1]), as to justify me in dispensing with a version of the greater part of the text printed in this volume, and in giving translations only of the parts of the Acallam not found in the Book of Lismore.

Extracts from the Lismore copy are given in O'Curry's Lectures, pp. 594—597, and in his Manners and Customs, III. pp. 12, 169, 305, 316, 325, 328, 361, 379.

IV. The copy in the Franciscan monastery, Merchants' Quay, Dublin. This has been noticed by Zimmer, Gött. Gel. Anz. 1887, s. 192. It contains 84 pages, of which the first four and the last two are in an ugly modern handwriting. The rest of the codex is in a good fifteenth-century script[1]). It ends with the words: tainic remhe arsin go dor*us* in tsidha 7 dorinne*dh* lamhach mas fíor, et cetera[2]), which corresponds with l. 7658. After the words corresponding with l. 6238 a leaf has been lost, and with it the matter contained in ll. 6220—6564. The arrangement of the stories in the Franciscan ms. differs somewhat from that of the other copies (see notes on ll. 224, 1450, 1479, 3725); and so many minor variations and additions are mentioned in the notes that it may well be regarded as a second recension. As literature, the Franciscan Acallam is inferior to the older versions, the scribe or redactor indulging overmuch in those strings of alliterating adjectives which debase the later compositions in Gaelic prose[3]). In none of the copies, however, will be found the 'mystical rant and unashamed incoherence' which characterise the work of some of the so-called Celtic revivalists. The tales, in fact, are generally told with sobriety and directness: they evince a genuine feeling for natural beauty[4]), a passion for music, a moral purity singular in a mediaeval collection of stories, a noble love for manliness and honour[5]). Some of them seem to me admirable for their unstudied pathos — see, for instance, the tale of Cael the Hardy and Créde, pp. 22—25, and the account of the deaths of Fithir and Dárine, pp. 117, 118. Sadder even than these is the non-fulfilment of the prophecy in ll. 301, 302, that the tales of the Fiann will be a pastime to the companies and nobles of the latter time. In Ireland, at least, there are now few companies and no nobles that are able to read them.

[1]) In the Revue Celtique XV 117—119 K. Meyer has corrected about thirty-eight wrong renderings, and to these I have added some fifty in the notes and glossary to the present edition.

[1]) The scribe's name appears in p. 13, Misi concobar o. d., and p. 21, Misi concobhar ó dhubhdha.

[2]) The modern scribe adds the following note: ni bhfuil ann níos mó ré sccríob*adh* don cor so. 7 da mb*eth* dodhéanmais ar ndíothcell fair.

[3]) See O'Donovan's remarks, The Battle of Dún na ngédh, p. IX.

[4]) See, for instance, the poem on Arran, ll. 340—351.

[5]) 'What maintained you so in your life?' says the Christian Patrick. And Cáilte, still a heathen, answers: 'Righteousness in our hearts, and strength in our arms, and fulfilment in our tongues', ll. 118—120.

None of the copies of the Acallam have preserved the conclusion, which must have contained the end of the story of the Lia Fáil, and probably described the minstrel Cass corach's wedding (see l. 7542), and the death and burial of Cáilte and Ossian[1]).

The notes, besides giving various readings, call attention to some parallels between the heroic age of the Irish and that of the Greeks[2]), and mention many of the points in which the Acallam illustrates Irish folklore, manners, customs and metric. To other realien the Index of Things will give access. The Indexes of Persons and Places call for no remark, save that I have vainly tried to identify many of the localities mentioned in the Acallam. A Gaelic onomasticon may, I am told, be expected from Father Hogan. By one Irishman, at all events, it will be gratefully welcomed. The Glossarial Index contains about 2100 entries, and will, I hope, be found a useful supplement to Professor Windisch's Wörterbuch. It owes much to Mr. S. H. O'Grady, for most of the explanations in inverted commas are borrowed from his Silva Gadelica. But few useful illustrations of Middle-Irish grammar are contained in the text now published. Of these the most important are

(1) the declension of arbor 'corn', gen. arba, O.Ir. arbe, from an arvor*, gen. arvês*, arvens*, which Prof. Strachan has compared with the declension of Gr. ἦπαρ, ἥπατος, Skr. yákṛt, yaknás[3]).

(2) the equatives in -thir, found for the most part in the Franciscan copy, and corresponding with adjectives compounded with com-. Examples are dergithir 6636n. = comderg 'as red',

[1]) Something, too, would perhaps be said of the 'potion of remembrance' promised to Cáilte by Bébind, and of the magical frock, mantle and fishhook given to him by that lady.

[2]) For others, see d'Arbois de Jubainville, La Civilisation des Celtes et celle de l'épopée homérique, Paris, 1899.

[3]) Still closer parallels are Lat. iter, itin-er-is, jecur, jecin-or-is, where the -er-, -or- of the genitive are intrusions from the nom. sg.: see Brugmann's Grundriss §§ 114, 397. For the ur-irisch genitive ending -ens, ibid. § 234.

dubithir 6636 n. = comdub 'as black', glaisithir 6637 n. = comglas 'as blue', and remithir 5943 n. = comremur 'as thick'.

(3) the use of the ordinals to denote one of the group indicated. For example: ind-ara 'one of two', tres 'one of three', cethramad 'one of four', cóiced 'one of five', ochtmad déc 'one of eighteen'. For references to these forms see the Glossarial Index.

(4) the nominal preposition chu-ind 2719, 5719, 6198 or chu-inn 2726 n.[1]), synonymous with do-chumm-n 'zu, nach, in, (meist nach Verben der Bewegung)', Wind. Wtb. 493. Here ind 'vertex, end', is possibly cognate with the Greek mountain-name Ἴνδος[2]), and cumm-n, from kudsmen*, is probably cognate with the reduplicated Skr. kakúd, kakúdmān, Lat. cacūmen.

Lastly, I entreat all students of this book to repay me for the time and labour that I have bestowed upon it, by making in their copies the corrections mentioned in pp. 435—437.

Cowes, Isle of Wight. September 1900. W. S.

[1]) Other examples of this preposition, which is ignored by the grammars and dictionaries, are: docuaid se cu inn taisidh [leg. taisigh] na sacart, H. 2. 17, p. 100[a], rangadur na haírgíd sín a n-oigreacht cu ind na Iubal, ibíd. an uair do tiucfad cu inn in brithemnais, ibid. 102[b]. do cuir se cu ind Eroid óe, ibid. 103[b].

[2]) It cannot be connected, as some have supposed, with Goth. andeis, Germ. ende, this being from antyó-*, cognate with Skr. ánta. An Old-Irish ét 'ende, spitze', cited by Kluge (s. v. Ende) and Uhlenbeck, (s. v. v. andéis, ánta-s) does not exist with this meaning.

How Patrick healed Cáilte's right side.

One day Patrick was reciting his hours, and when he had finished, they heard on the hill beside them the noise of a hunt and chase out of Berrobail. "Feeble is the cry of the hounds and the men that we hear", says Cailte; "and 'tis owing to the death of the lord Find that this hunt is making it (so faint), and to the death of Mac Lugach the valiant, and the death of Diarmait O'Duibni, and of Aed the Little, son of Find, who was killed in the east in England in a furious battle, and the lack of Dub dá Chonn and Dub Dithrib, son of the king of Leinster, and the decease of Dithrubach, son of the Scál, son of Eogan, the son of Find's mother, slain by Cáilte Coscar-ríg, son of the king of France, and the burial of Conán the Bald, son of Morna, and of Ferdoman, son of Bodb, because of Findinne, Bodb's daughter."

Then said Patrick to Cáilte. "Sad is thy wail of sorrow to be thus bereft of thy Fiann! But it is not in them thou shouldst now believe, but in the glorious God who created heaven and earth." "Well, my soul, my holy cleric," (says Cailte), "hadst thou known the Fiann thou wouldst have loved them, since I am dear to thee, I, who have spent my vigour and my spear-throwing."

The whole host heard that, and sad they were at the true hero and true brave's doings on that day in the absence of his Fiann. "Cáilte, my soul,' says Patrick, "why dost thou not go to see (the hunt)?" "Fain would I go, holy Patrick, but for a spearcast which Sescenn, son of Fer-dub, made upon me at the battle of Kenmare in the south, and I cannot go because of the bloodclots of that cast. But it was his last shot, for he himself fell there. And now I thank the King of heaven and earth that I may be listening to the crow of the cock in this place."

"Whereon then did the spear alight?" asked Patrick. "On my right side here, holy Patrick, where the shield was not protecting me." Then Patrick put his right palm to the olace of the blow, and the spear(head) came forth through the wound, and the knee of the biggest man of the host would pass through the socket and fitting of the spear. The nearest to Cailte in the church was Mael-trena, son of Dínertach. "My boy", says Cailte, "take hold of my hand, for the Adzehead has gone to see the hunt."

Cailte sang:

O scholar, take me out, since Celebration has ended,
To hear the hound that hunts a deer out of Berrobol . . .
O cock that crowest clearly, for whom dost thou make thy music? etc.

Then Cáilte came forth, and Mael-trena, Patrick's primal pupil, held his hand, and took him to the bed-house after the spear had been extracted, and there he remained that night, groaning and lamenting.

The Death of Dubchraide the Robber.

[Text: lines 4049—4053].

There was a brigand in that country, Dubchraide, son of Dubtnúthach ('Blackheart, son of Dark-envious'), emperilling[1] and persecuting Patrick; and Patrick said:

I give permission to dear Cailte, who has put many heroes into graves, though he kill Dubchraidech and get him gratis.

And after that the man died.

The Origin of Ard Senaig.

[Text: lines 4054—4077.]

And there they abode for three days and three nights, and then they all fared forward to the Fiann's Valley on the hither side of Cruachan, and sat down on Ard Senaig (Senach's Height') above the Fiann's Valley. "O Cáilte," said Patrick, "why was this height called Ard Senaig?" "I will tell thee," answers Cáilte. "Find had an excellent minstrel named Senach ua Daigri, and here he died of an hour's illness. And the hillock was built over him, so that from him it is called Ard Senaig." And Cáilte said:

'I remember what Senach got from Find for his music — 'twas no grief and being with naught — thirty ounces every quarter. A golden penny for every man in the host to comely, ruddy-haired Senach, that he might sing — great the deed — and send them into a (charmed) sleep.'

"Cáilte, my soul," says Patrick, "manifold was that abundance of wealth." "It was manifold," says Cailte; "for if he had given no treasure save what he gave to women and minstrels the treasure (so given) would be vast." "And did he endow many women thus?' asks Patrick. "Truly he did endow them," answers Cáilte, saying:

Three hundred women Find endowed, by the King who is above my head (God), a separate brideprice to every woman — vast was the treasure altogether.

"Great was that warrior's generosity!" says Patrick. "It was great," says Cailte; "for he left no woman without her brideprice, nor servant without his due, nor man(-at-arms) without his pay. And he never promised in the night what he would not fulfil in the (following) day, and he never promised in the day what he would not fulfil in the (following) night."

The story of Étain Fairhair's wooing and death.

Once upon a time, when Find son of Cumall was on this hill, they saw upon it a woman a-waiting them. She wore a crimson fringed mantle with a golden brooch therein, and she had a frontlet of yellow gold at her forehead. Find asked tidings of her, whence she came, and she answered him: "From the Peak of Étar, son of Étgaeth the champion, in the east[1]." "What is thy name, O damsel?" says Find. "Étáin Fairhair is my name," says she, "daughter of Aed Whitebreast, out of the Elfmound of Benn Étair in the east". "Why hast thou come hither thence?" says Find. "'To ask one of the Fiann of Erin to race me,' she replied. "How dost thou run?" asked Diarmait O'Duibni. "Good is my running," says the damsel, "whether long or short is the earth or ground under my foot, 'tis the same to me to be running." Said Cáilte:

'When we came to Benn bán a woman joined our company', etc. [They raced to the hillock over Badammar, thence to Dublin, where Cailte was the first to arrive, and thence to the elfmound at Howth, where they found mead and wine, and remained twenty nights.]

"And this was our number when we reached that elfmound", says Cailte, "twenty hundreds of the Fiann of Erin including Find son of Cumall; and we sat on the bedrail of the palace in the elfmound, and then our feet were washed, and our hunger was abated, and our thirst was quenched. And as we were there, Find saw a gentle yellow-haired damsel in front of the vats, with a cup of white silver in her hand, and she distributing to every one.

Then said the prince Find: "It seems to us that yon is the damsel that challenged the Fiann to run and race from the Fort of Slieve Grod in the west to Benn Étair'. "It was not she at all," says Aed Whitebreast, the king of the elfmound, "for yon is the slowest of our women." "Who then was it?" asked Find. "Bé-mannair, daughter of Ainceol," replied Aed Whitebreast, "the she-messenger of the Tuath dé Danann. And 'tis she that shifts into the shape of a spegduban and a whale, and forms herself into the semblance of a fly, and of a true lover, both man and woman, so that all leave their secret with her. She it is that outraced thee in the east, and not yon damsel, who was (then) drinking and making merry at the vats in the elfmound". "And how is yon damsel named?" asked Find.

[1] i. e. from Howth.

"Étáin Fairhair", says Aed, "a daughter of mine, and a darling of all the Tuath dé Danann. And thus is that girl, with a lover in the Fianns of Erin." "Good, my soul," says Find, "which of us is that lover?" "Oscar, son of Ossian," says Aed; "and 'tis she that sent the messenger for you to the Fort of Slieve Grod in the south. And Cairbre Lifechair, son of Cormac (king of Erin,) has offered to give the Tuath dé Danann, as her bride-price, the cantred nearest to Bregia and Meath, and to put himself and an equal weight of gold and silver into a balance, and to give it all to her." "Why did ye not agree (to yield) her for this to the king of Erin's son?" "We did not accept it," says Aed, "for she had not a whit of desire or inclination herein, and therefore we made no dealing or covenant about her." "Well," says Find, "what condition dost thou seek from us? Well, my soul, my damsel, what condition dost thou ask from the son of the son of the king-champion, even Oscar?" Said the damsel: "Never to leave me until my own evil deeds come against me!" "Verily", says Oscar, "thou shalt have this condition." "Give us sureties and guarantees for it," says the damsel. "What sureties dost thou demand?" "Goll mac Morna of the sons of Morna, and of the Fianna of Erinn, Find, son of Cumall." So those sureties were given to her, and the damsel and Oscar were wedded; and we staid there for twenty nights afterwards.

Then Oscar asked Find: "Whither shall I take my wife?" "To broad-green Almu (Allen) of Leinster," says Find, "till the end of seven years; and thenceforward do thou thyself leave the place to her."

And, after that, the banded battle of Benn Étair (Howth) was delivered, and in it Oscar was sorely wounded, and thereby the Fiann were distracted, and Find also was distracted. And one night Étáin Fairhair came upon the bed into Oscar's company, and saw that the great and kingly form that he wore had departed: so greenness and darkness came to her, and the damsel raised aloft her mournful cries and her high lamentable wail, and she went to her (own) bed, and (there) her heart in her breast broke like a nut, and she died of grief for her husband and her first-love, as she beheld him. And she was taken to her own elf-mound, to the Elfmound of Benn Étair, and was laid in earthen hollows. So that Fert Étáine ('Étáin's Grave') is its name. She left three noble sons with Oscar. Luath and Indell and Oscar were their names. That is the story which you asked of me," says Cáilte, "and therefore this place is called Benn bán in retha" ('the White Peak of the Race.')

The story of Cuillenn and Callann and their son Fer óc.

(Text: lines 5725—5886)

And there they staid that night till day with its full radiance came on the morrow. And saint Patrick and all the host arose and fared forth to Cuillenn and to Callann in Húi-Cuanach, and there Patrick sat down, so that Suide Pátraic ('Patrick's seat') is the name of the place from that time to this. The king of Munster sits at Patrick's shoulder, and in front of him sat Cáilte.

Then Eogan Redside, son of Oengus, king of Munster, demanded of Cáilte: "Why was this place called Callann and Cuillenn? and why was the name Lige in óic ('the Warrior's Grave') given to yonder hill, and Clad na Féine ('Dyke of the Fian') to this dyke surrounding the land and the district?" And Cailte answered that question (thus:)

"One day," says Cailte, "Find, son of Cumall, was at Ráith Chuiri between Dundalk and the sea, at the end of Tráig Baili, and Lepaid na hiubraige ('the Bed of the Iubrach') on one side of Find, and Ráith na hechraide ('the Rath of the horses'), the place of the Dub-sainglenn and the Liath Macha[1], on the other side, and Dundalk behind us. We had not been there long when we saw on the strand to the north thirty charioteers coming straight towards us. They alighted and unyoked their horses, and the great wide-eyed warrior, who was eldest and noblest of them, sat down by Find's shoulder. The lord Find asked his tidings: "whence hast thou come, my soul, my warrior, and who art thou thyself?" quoth he. "Callann, son of Fergus the Fair, am I," says the warrior, "son of the king of Ulaid in the north; and my own brother Aed Donn, is banishing me, and he lets me not be with (king) Cormac húa Cuinn, and keeps me off my own heritage. So I have come to have speech with thee, O royal champion, for we are related, Mes Mungel ('Whiteneck,') daughter of Oengus, king of Ulaid, thy grandmother, being own sister to my father and mother of Cumall.

"If so," says Ossian, "'tis from the Ulaid we have brought the fury and the fierceness(?) that are in us.' "'Tis from them assuredly," says Find. "Is it in Ulster that thou wouldst get land?" "Nay indeed," says Callann, "since we should not commit parricide between us." "If so," says Find, "I will go tomorrow to Eochaid Red-edge, son of Find, king of Munster's two provinces, and I will seek for thee land from him for a time and a season. And unless I get thee land from him with his consent, I will deliver battle at the end of Tráig Baile to the king of Ulaid for thine own land."

Then the three battalions of the Fiann, with Callann, son of the king of Ulaid, before them, marched southwards to the Fort of Slieve Grod, to the place where the king of Munster was dwelling. And the king came and met Find and the Fiann of Erin, and said: "Welcome is thy arrival, my soul, O Find, "and loyal is this greeting of ours." "'Tis loyal indeed," says the king (of the Fiann). Then they entered the fortress, and they were ministered to, and the drinking-house was arranged for them, and Goll mac Morna was placed on one of Find's hands, and the son of the king of Ulaid on the other hand.

Then said the king of Munster: "have ye seen of the men of Erin, or the men of the whole world, a third whose shape is better than that of yon warrior at Find son of Cumall's shoulder?" And the king asked: "who is that warrior in thy company, O Find?" So Find told him Callann's name and description, and that Callann had come to ask him for land and heritage. "By my word," says the king of Munster, "if one as good as yon should come himself to ask for territory and land, it were proper to bestow it upon him; but when thou, my soul, my royal champion, askest it, 'tis the more proper to give it to him. And lo, there are two cantreds from me to him," says the king of Munster. "And a third cantred to me and to the Fian!" says Find. And that also was given to Callann, so that he had three cantreds.

"In what place dost thou give him that land?" says Find. "Breccthír — now called Húi Chuanach — and Tulach na dála" — now called Cuillinn. "Rude and Ultonian are my people," says Callann, son of Fergus. "I have a counsel for thee as to that," says the king of Munster. "Let the Fiann there build a rampart and a fortification round thy land." So the Fiann's three battalions arose, and built it in the seven days of the week, and a 'host-door of contention' was made on it. And after it was built for him, Find and the Fiann's three battalions, and Callann, son of Fergus, son of the king of Ulaid, went with them again to the Fortress of Slieve Grod.

Then said Find: "Well, my soul, O king of Munster, knowest thou on what other errand we came to thee?" "Truly I know not", says the king. "To demand thy daughter Cuillenn for Callann, son of Ulaid's king." "What is her bride-price and her present?" asked her father. "An hundreded bride-price," says Find, — that is, a hundred to her of every kind of cattle and of every generation (now existing); and by my word, it shall go to her,[1]" says Find. So that (bride-price) was bound to her, and on that night the king of Munster's daughter was wedded to the king of Ulaid's son.

And Callann went northward for his people, and they came with him to the land which the king of Munster had given him, and there he built a great fortress.

The damsel bore him a famous and beautiful son named Fer óc ('young man'); and in all Ireland there was scarcely one whose shape and vigour and spearcasting were as good as his.

[1] I read (with Fr.) rachaid, dar mo breithir, instead of the corrupt rach sin ar breithir of Laud.

To this place we went, three battalions of the Fiann, having ten hundred and twenty hundred in each battalion; and as we were standing there we saw a single youth playing on the green, with a heavy lump of a stone on his palm, and he used to give a cast of it so that it would fly over ten furrows, and he would run beneath it, and catch it with his hand in the air. And we, the three battalions of the Fiann, were long looking at him. "Never," says Find, "have we seen better casting than that; and who, my men, is the youth that achieves it?" "The son of the owner of this place," says every one, "even Fer óc, son of Callann, son of the king of Ulaid." "Never," [says Find] "has there come from the Ulaid, since their great and gallant men departed (life), better makings of a warrior than that youth." "Never indeed has there come," say all at the same time. "And he does another casting that is harder than that." "What is it?" says Find. "He puts the shafts of his two spears against the ground, with his back to the homestead, and he leaps with the spearshafts over the gate, and alights on the stone on the other side with the spears in his hand, and he leaps back with them out over the stead, and lights upon this green."

"O Fer óc," says Find, "for the truth of thy conscience, perform this feat in our presence!" "We will do it," says the youth. "But I am ashamed to perform it in the presence of the Fiann of Erin, unless I succeed in doing it well." Then he performed the feat in presence of Find and the Fiann, as well as ever he had done it.

To them then came Callann and Cuillenn, the father and mother of the youth, and gave a beautiful welcome to Find and the rest of the Fiann. "Well, my soul, my son," say they (to Fer óc), "make thy covenant and thy fellowship with Find." He arose and made his covenant and his fellowship with Find; and, after that, we entered the fort, and there we abode carousing and enjoying ourselves.

Then said the lord Find: 'where is Berrach, daughter of Cass of Cuailgne?" "Here, my soul, my royal champion," says the damsel. "Take the 'measure of hundreds' unto thee, and put into it thrice its fill of gold and thrice its fill of silver, and give that to Fer óc as his wage." And the youth divided it into three, to wit, a third to his father, a third to his mother, and another third to sages and to ollaves and to the treasurers of the Fiann of Erin. "Wisely hath the wage been divided," says Find. And they were there till on the morrow day came with its full radiance.

Then was a hunt and a battue held by the three battalions of the Fiann. Howbeit, on that day, owing to Fer óc (and his superior skill) to none of the Fiann it fell to get first blood of pig or deer. Now when they came home, after finishing the hunt, a sore lung-disease attacked Fer óc, through the (evil) eyes of the multitude and the envy of the great host, and it killed him, soulless, at the end of nine days. He was buried on yonder green-grassed hill," says Cailte, "and the shining stone that he held when he was at games and diversion is that yonder rising out of his head.

So that from him Tulach in óic ('the hill of the youth') is the name of that hill.

And his mother remained for a year in this stead after her son. And every day she would go to her son's grave, and throughout that year she was bewailing him. And one day she died of grief for her son, and she, too, was put into this hillock.

So that from her is the name Cuillenn.

"And this", says Cailte, "is one of the four places at which the Fianns of Frin used to don their fine comely-mantled garments, namely, Tara of Bregia, and Temair Luachra, and in broad-great Allen of Leinster, and here in Cuillenn. Here, too, in every year the lord Find used to deliver three battles to the Fiann, and champions were brought and chosen for valour in place of all the Fiann that were killed. And here the fierce wild stags and the heavy-sided boars were brought to us to the floor of the house of drinking and delight. And on that day Cuillenn was an abode of deer and game.

And Cailte said:

Cuillenn was an abode of deer, was a fort of a king with rule, was beautiful in the hour of battle, with its raiment of many colours, etc.

"Victory and benison be thine," says Eogan Redside, son of Oengus; "and O Cailte, sad is the tale thou hast told us, the tale of Fer óc."

The beginning of the story of the Ridge of the Dead Woman.

[Text: lines 5887—5940.]

Not long were they there when they saw a great and gallant body of men marching towards them in two divisions: eight score armed with shields in each band of them, and bulwarks of brown red shields around them; a wood of lofty spears at their shoulders; a lad, brown, excellent, beautiful, in the van of the band, with a golden diadem on his head as a sign of royalty, a purple mantle round another warrior who was their chief, and who wore on his head a helmet of gold. They knelt to Patrick, and laid their heads in his bosom.

"Who are ye, O warriors?" says Patrick. "Two kings of West Munster. I am Derg, son of Dínertach, son of Mael-dúin, and the other is Flann, son of Flann, son of Failbe. A great and beautiful banquet we have (ready) for thee, O king of Munster", say the warriors; "and we shall be the better if thou bring saint Patrick with thee to drink our feast. For we wish our districts and lands to be blessed by him, and (we also wish) to give him our live-service and our dead-service, for never have we had a clerical friend except him."

"Precede us," says the king, "and we will follow in your rear." They remained there that night, till on the morrow day came with its full radiance. And the whole of that host, and Patrick with his people, came southward to Cathair na cét on one of the two summits of Slieve Mish. The two kings of West-Munster came to meet them, and made welcome to Patrick and the king of Munster, and they gave saint Patrick a 'gospel-penny,' to wit, for each of them three score ounces of gold and three score ounces of silver.

Then Eogan Redside, king of Munster, asked Cáilte: "And why was this place called the Oakwood of the Conspiracy,' and why was this ridge called the Ridge of the Dead Woman, and why was this little rath called the Little Rath of the Incantation?" Cáilte answered: "I have knowledge thereof, though its origin is ancient."

'Once upon a time, when Find and the three battalions of the Fiann came hither to have a hunt and a breaking-up (of deer), we were not long here till we saw a single person approaching us. He sat down on this hillock in our company, and a woman was there, with a smock of royal velvet next her skin. Around her was a mantle fringed and purple, with a golden brooch therein. She wore a soft[1], plaited, gilded tunic, with a golden breastplate thereon, and a diadem of gold on her head. Not trifling was the thing to which we compared her, to wit, the mast of a great ship over a high summit; and there were but few of us who felt not horror and fear and awe at the excellence of the woman's shape and at her size. For we were not folk of the same era as she, for she was bigger, greatly bigger. Goll, son of Morna, was then at Find's right hand, and there, in presence of Munster's two provinces, Cáilte gave a great testimony as to Goll. "He," said Cailte, "was the upper hand (in fighting), and the deadly wave over fierce bands, and the bold lion, and one of the five best warriors behind shield and sword and spear that were in Erin and Alba at the same epoch and era as he. For these were the five whose bravery was best at one time in Erin, namely, Find, son of Cumall, and Lugaid Lágda, and Oscar, son of Ossian, and Goll, son of Morna, and by my word," says Cailte, "'tis no bragging (to say) that I was the fifth."

Then said Find to Goll, (speaking) past her: "Hast thou ever seen a woman bigger than yon woman?" "By my word," answered Goll, "I never saw, nor has any other ever seen, a woman bigger than she is."

The story of the Oakgrove of the Conspiracy.

"And why, O Cáilte', says the king of Munster, "was this oakgrove called 'the Oakgrove of the Conspiracy?'" "The four of whom thou hast heard me tell (as being) at 'the Little Rath of the Marvels,' namely, the three warriors and the hound, to kill these the Fiann here conspired." 'What cause had they to conspire against them, and they in the Fiann's own service?" "The cause of the conspiracy was that the Fiann understood not the arrangement or the procedure which the warriors chose to follow, namely, their having a camp apart and a rampart of fire flaming about them, and none to see them from that rampart of fire until dawn on the morrow. And Find said: "By no means would I have them killed, for of the world's men they are the three best in spearthrowing and vigour. And they possess three arts, and it would not be right for the men of the world to kill them because of their having those arts," "Namely, says Cailte," were the men of (all) the world in disease and sickness, should one of the three apply herbs to the ailment of each, he would thereafter be smooth and scarless. And whatever is asked of the second man is gotten from him. And as to the third man, let the wants of the world be told him, and they will be fully satisfied by him. And in addition to, and beyond any of these he had a pipe, and the men of the world would sleep (at its sound), however great their illness. Moreover, as to the hound, though none of us should kill a deer or other animal, thanks to it we should have no lack (of food)."

Then said the lord Find to them: "Know ye why ye have been brought to parley with me?" "We know not," say the warriors. "The Fianns of Erin deem you disloyal because of the arts which ye practise with them, and they desire to order you to depart and to give you your wage." "What evil have we done?" ask the warriors, "that we are ordered to depart?'

[1] The part of Lism. corresponding to lines 6083—6096 is accurately translated in Silva Gadelica, II, 242.

"We know not," say the Fiann, "save that ye have customs which we never saw nor heard of being practised by men before you, namely, a rampart of fire around you every night, and that after nightfall ye do not like anyone to see you, so ye put that rampart of fire around you." "And what harm to you is our doing that, O Find?" say the warriors: "for not to you shall we be oppressive, (but) every good thing we do, to you it belongs." Then said the lord Find: "that is the speech of gentlemen; and shewing you spite or making reproach by me or any of the Fianna of Erin shall never occur by day or by night. And there is something I fain would ask you," says Find. "If we know it," they say, "it shall be told thee." "What names do ye bear?" asked Find. "I am called Dub" ('Dark') says the warrior who wrought the cures. "I am Ág" ('Battle') says the middle warrior. "I am Ilar" ('Eagle'), says the other warrior. And Cailte said, in describing those men and the hound:

Dub and Ág and Ilar, loving the triad, dear was the place, and Fermac, good was the hound, used to be in the midst among them, etc.

"Now go to your home," says Find; "and so long as anyone shall follow me ye shall be[1]...., and the fellowship ye have not found ye shall get henceforward." "And therefore," says Cailte, "this oakgrove about which you questioned me, O king, was called 'The Oakgrove of the Conspiracy.'

'Victory and benison fall to thee!' says Eogan Redside, king of Munster, to Cailte: "well hast thou solved those two questions. But thou hast been asked a third question (still) unanswered, namely, why was this little rath called Ráithín na Sénaigechta?

The story of the Little Rath of the Incantation.

[Text: lines 6146—6269.]

One day when Find was here on his seat, with the three battalions of the Fiann, we saw three bald-red husbandmen

[1] some word seems wanting here in Laud. The '7 tuilled' of Fr. 70b onakes no sense.

coming towards us, holding three red hounds in their hands, and three spears; and (there was) venom on their weapons, and venom on their dress, and on their hands and their feet, and on everything which they touched. "Whence have ye come, my men?' says Find, "and who are ye yourselves?" "Three sons of Uar, son of Indast, are we," they answer, "of the Tuath dé Danann. A warrior of thy people killed our father in the battle of the Tuath dé Danann on Sliab Én ('the Mountain of Birds') in the east — now called 'the Mountain of Aige, son of Ugaine' — and we have come to demand of thee, O Find, the eric of our father.' "You have been long in coming to demand it," says Find. "We supposed," say they, "until thou camest to the Feast of Tara, that it was Mider's sons that fought that battle, and the men of Ireland knew that it was thou that gave hostages of the Tuath dé Danann to the sons of Mider in that battle." "And what warrior of my people," asked Find, "do ye charge with the killing of your father?" "Cáilte, son of Rónán," they reply. "By my word," says Find, "he is one of the six men who were in my company there. And what names do ye bear?' asks Find. "Aincél ('Ill-omen') and Digbail ('Damage') and Espaid ('Want') are our names; and what answer do you give us, O Find?" "No one before me has given an eric for a man killed in battle, and I will not give one," says Find. "We shall inflict plunder and robbery upon thee." "What plunder is that?' says Find. 'We are three brothers," they say, "and we shall, each of us, inflict plunder." "I will do (this)," says Aincél: "whether three or two or four of the Fiann chance upon me, I will take all their feet and hands from them." "I will do (this)," says Digbail; "I will not go a day from them without (causing) lack of hound or gillie or warrior to the Fianns of Erin." "And I will not leave them," says the third man, Espaid, "without their lacking a band or company or foot or hand or one eye." "Unless we get somewhat to help us against them," says Cailte, "no one of us will be alive at the end of a year."

Then said the lord Find: "Well, ye Fianns of Erin, let a fortress and goodly stead be built by you here, where yonder men met me; for, until I find out which of us is the stronger I will not be (retreating) before them throughout Erin, and they in my rear (pursuing)." So the Fiann arose, and each of their captains built a little rath (ráithín) and fortress around him and his company, from the summit of Slieve Mish in the west as far as this," says Cáilte. "We suppose," says the king of Ulster, "that for some reason these little raths were (each) called Ráithín na n-othrus" ('the little rath of the healings') "It was for this," says Cailte; "because the three remained here for a month and a quarter and a year inflicting every ailment and every bane upon the Fiann. And here the healing of the Fiann from these hurts was performed."

At that time and hour the three sons of the king of Iruath, who were accompanying Find, came to have speech with him, and took him apart on a 'sod of scrutiny of prudence,' and said to him: "Well, my soul, O Find, we desire to give thee a circuit of our wolfhound, that is, to let him go round thee thrice in every day. And then, though a multitude be intending to do thee evil, or to plunder thee, they will achieve nothing from one day to the next, provided there be not fire or weapon or dog in the same house with him. For it is a geis (tabu) of his, to have none of these things in the same house." 'None of them,' says Find, "shall be in the same house with your hound, and he shall return safe to you." Thus, every day the hound was sent to Find, having about his neck his ridgy red golden chain, wherein were fifty conchlanns of refined gold. And the hound used to go in that wise thrice round Find, and put his tongue thrice upon him. And to those who were nearest the hound it seemed as if a vat of mead, after being strained, was there, from the odour that would come from him, and to others it seemed that the odour that came from him, when he entered the house to Find, was the perfume of a fragrant apple-garth. "During that year", says Cailte, "those three (sons of Uar) committed great plunderings on the Fiann: but for every sickness and every evil that Aincél caused, Dub, son of the king of Iruath, used to apply his herb and his leeching, so that the patients were hale on the morrow. And to those whom Espaid and Digbail injured Ág and Ilar would give their help and succour.

"Then," says Cailte, "Cormac húa Cuinn was told of those foemen doing evil to Find, and 'tis from them", says Cailte, "come the famous proverbs, namely, to one whom bane or want afflicts, this is the common saying: Aincél has visited thee. And also, to one whom damage or want afflicts, Digbail and Espaid have visited thee.

"'Tis then," says Cailte, "that a gathering and muster was made by Cormac húa Cuinn, the king of Ireland. Eight and twenty battalions, with a thousand and two thousand in each, came to this hill to work with Find and the Fianns of Erin. And Find made welcome to Cormac and to the other nobles of the men of Ireland, and related the great distress in which he and the Fianna had been during that year, "save that the three sons of the king of Iruath were helping us against them." 'Why', asks Cormac, 'should not folk possessed of such arts find some spell or charm or craft which would drive the sons of Uar out of Ireland?' So then," says Cailte, "Cormac told me to go for the three sons of the king of Iruath. I went and fetched them to Cormac and Find and the nobles of Ireland, and Cormac beheld them. "Handsome are the men," says Cormac, "and good are their shape and character. And well, my sons, would ye find a spell or charm which would banish from Ireland yon three foemen who are destroying the Fianns of Erin?" "If", say the warriors, "we could find them near us (tomorrow), we would enjoin them[1]) to depart (and) drive them from the men of Ireland". "Where", says Find, is Ág, son of the king of Iruath?" "Here", says the warrior. "Where are yon three foemen who are destroying Ireland?" "They are on Daire's Cairn, here at the end of the camp", answers Ág. "And where are Garb-cronán and Saltrán Longheel?' asks Find. 'Here, O royal champion!" say the gillies. "Go for yonder men, and tell them I will give them what the king of Ireland awards in respect of their father." So the gillies fared forth for them as far as this, and gave them the message. Then they came, with the messengers, to Cormac and Find, and those three sat down on the dyke of this rath; and Cormac was there, with eight and twenty battalions, and we (also), the three battalions of the Fiann".

[1] The words ní ris a, which here seem meaningless, are not in Fr. and have been omitted in the translation

Then said Cormac: "Arise, O Dub, son of the king of Iruath, and command them by spell and charm to leave Ireland!" So Dub arose and said: "Go by virtue of this spell and charm, ye three foemen, one-eyed, lame-thighed, foul-thighed, half-blind, left-handed, of the race of wondrous evil, from the gravelly plains of Hell below, and of the race of Buadnat, daughter of Herod, daughter of him who gave up and delivered into the hands of the unbelieving Jews the true and glorious God and the Lord of all human beings! And go forth on the bitter-deep brine, and let each of you deal a sword-blow on the crown of each of his brothers. For long enough are ye plundering and robbing the truly-judging royal champion, even Find, son of Cumall. Get you gone to the original kindred of your father and mother and grandsire, to the gravelly hillocks of Hell below, and may fire consume you there!"

Then the wolfhound raised his tail, and brought a blast under them from below, and forth they fared on the fruitful green-sided sea, and each of them dealt a swordblow on the other's head. So thus the three brothers died and went to Hell.

Cailte sang:

They fared forth from us on the sea that was hugely-waved, etc.

And because of that spell this little rath is called 'The Little Rath of the Incantation'.

The story of the baleful Birds: Cailte's problem; and Aillenn's love for the king of Connaught.

(Text: lines 6270—6399).

Then said Flann son of Flann and Derg son of Dínertach: "It were meet for us to ask for that spell, O Cailte, my soul".

"For what reason?" asks the king of Munster. "Each of our men, including the two that we are, has eight cantreds, which amount to the whole kingdom of West Munster, and at the very time and hour for reaping our harvest three flocks of birds come to us from the western sea, with beaks of bone and breaths of fire out of their necks; and as cold as a spring-wind is the wind that issues from their wings. And when every one wishes (to put) a hand to the fields, they come to us", says Flann, son of Flann, "and at one time in every twelve-month a bird attacks every ear in our cornfield, and they carry it off: the second time they bear away (our fruit), so that they leave neither apple on appletree, nor nut on hazel, nor berry on rowan; and when they come the third time they leave neither fledgling nor fawn on the ground, nor silly little child; nor is there aught that they can lift that they take not away". "And whence do they come?" says Cailte, "or what are they themselves? or to what end do they go?" "Some of us are saying", quoth Derg, son of Dínertach, "that they come out of the elfmounds and from the Tuath dé Danann. Others are saying that they are a birdflock out of Hell (sent) to do evil and injury to the men of Ireland". "But whencesoever they come", say the warriors, "we must leave them this district and land, for we cannot any longer endure them".

Then said Cailte to Patrick: "Where is the lord of knowledge and computation, even saint Patrick? I would fain ask thee a question'. "If I know the answer", says Patrick, "thou shalt have it, for I have often put questions to thee". "In what year is there a month without a moon", says Cailte, "and a moon without a month, and a month that includes three moons?" "The year of the Quartill", says Patrick, "which is between two thousands of years, that is, a thousand before it and a thousand after it. The first month of that year is without a moon. In the next month there is a moon, but the moon has not a month because of the following month. The third month", says Patrick, "takes three moons upon it, i. e. the first moon of the first month, which we have reckoned in the course (?) of our previous question, and the first moon of the previous quarter the same month takes; and the third moon", says Patrick, "is the moon of the kalends of that month's original era".

"Success and benison attend thee, O saint Patrick!" says Cailte; "and a blessing came to the generation of the men of Ireland the day thou camest unto them. For there was a demon at the butt of every single grassblade therein before thine advent, but today there is an angel at the butt of every grassblade therein. And blessing to the men of Ireland who shall see thee and to those of them who shall not see thee, for thy miracles and marvels will serve them. And well, my soul, O Patrick", says Cailte, "when is that year of the Quartill of which thou toldest me?" "Yestreen was the first night of it", says Patrick, "And the month that contains the three moons", says Cailte, "when comes it?" "Tomorrow night is the eve of its commencement, and the day next to it. "And when are your cornfields ripe, O Derg, son of Dínertach?" "Unless that ill-omened flock of birds tarry (here), we shall be reaping tomorrow", says the warrior. "When do ye expect those birds to come to you?" asks Cailte. "Tomorrow certainly", says Flann, son of Flann, "at the same time[1] of day tomorrow as Dub, son of the king of Iruath, put a spell and charm on the three sons of Uar, son of Idast, when weapons killed them, and the wave of the flood overwhelmed the three brothers". "And why then", says Cailte, "should I not bestow a spell and charm on Flann and Derg, the two kings of West Munsters, in the name of the Trinity, unchanged and unchangeable, against the birds that come every year to ruin them?"

So, early on the morrow, he fared forward, with the nobles of the provinces of Munster, and Patrick together with them, up to the summit of Slieve Mish. Then the birds came to the cornfields as they used to come every year, and every one beheld them, and they settled on the cornfields, and Cailte said:

[1] For comainm I non read comaimser.

"Depart, ye children of Ruadmael daughter of Rugatal, of the seed of the Miller of Hell, who destroys the cattle and food and gold and silver of the world, and all its many other treasures, and for whom gathering and grudging are practised, so that he casts it (hoarded wealth), into the mouth of (his) mill, and makes dust and ashes thereof.

"And go", says Cailte, 'ye children of Bolcan, son of Nemed — the worst that is and that will be! And go, by virtue of this spell and charm out to the choice blue-fronted sea, so that each of you may kill the others, and make dust and ashes of them, and that ye may not know the just and truly-judging apostle of the Gaels' island, even saint Patrick son of Calpurn, chief of the devotion and faith of the Gaels. And betake yourselves to the Mountain of Witness, and leave Ireland to him, for it is not fitting that you should be therein against him!"

Then the birdflock arose at that charm which Cailte put upon them, and they fared forward out to sea, and each of them killed the others with their beaks of bone and their breaths of fire. Wherefore 'Crag of the Birdflock'[1] is the name of the crag over the edge of Slieve Mish by the sea, and 'The Spell of the Birds of the cornfields' is the name of that spell thenceforward. And Cailte said:

Good (was) my journey, O vehement Derg, to reach you from afar, since I put from you the birds away on the awful, stormy sea.

Then Patrick consecrated the district and the land, so that neither horror, nor witch, nor destruction came into it thenceforward. And the host entered the fortress, having Patrick along with them, and there they were till the end of the week, merry and easy, a-drinking that feast. And this was the king of Connaught when that birdflock was cast out of Ireland, Aed, son of Muiredach, son of Finnachta.

The king of Connaught was then at Dún Leoda Loingsig, and there he was partaking of a great feast which he held. And one night there, at fall of (the clouds of) evening, he came out on the greengrassed lawn; and as he was there, with the nobles of his household around him, he saw on one side a gentle, yellow-maned damsel, who looked not at the host, but at the king alone; and strange was the damsel's fashion. "Whence hast thou come, my damsel?" says the king of Connaught. "Out of the glittering Brugh in the east", says the damsel. "For what hast thou come?" says the king. "Thou art a sweetheart of mine.' "Whose daughter art thou?" says the king, "and what is thy name?" "Aillenn the Multiform I", quoth she, "daughter of Bodb the Red, the Dagda's son". "Knowest thou, my soul, my Aillenn", says the king, "that a sore lung-disease seized me, and draughts of sudden death were gotten by my father and my mother; but the Adze-head, saint Patrick, brought me back to life, and bound me to have only one consort, even Aifi the Multiform, daughter of Eogan Redside, the king of Leinster. And yet, by my word", says the king, "never have I seen a woman whom I would rather have to wife than thou, were I not subject to the cleric's discipline and to fear of the King of heaven and earth. And now, my soul, my damsel", says the king, "wouldst thou like to be seen by the nobles of the province?" "I should like, indeed", says the damsel, "for I am not a...elfwoman, but one of the Tuath dé Danann, with my own body about me". And the damsel displayed herself to the host, and never saw they, before or after, a woman lovelier than she. "And what doom dost thou pass upon me", O king of Connaught?" says the damsel. "Truly", says the king, "I will pass the doom that saint Patrick will pass. That I will give thee".

Then the king commanded seven of his household to go for saint Patrick to Cathair na Cloenratha in the south, to the summit of Slieve Mish; and they fared forth till they came thither, and there they found Patrick.

Then Patrick bade farewell to the two provinces of Munster, and left a blessing with them, and came on with those envoys to Benn in Bailb, now called Benn Gulban, in Maenmag. And thither Aed the king of Connaught came to meet saint Patrick, and he laid his head on Patrick's breast, and knelt to him, and gave him power over the province from small to great. And the king was relating to Patrick the story of the damsel. "And art thou", asked Patrick, "the damsel that gave love to the king of Connaught?" "I am", replies the damsel.

Fiadmor's quest of Find's daughter Aé.

(Text: lines 6444—6493.)

Then the king of Connaught welcomed Cailte and enquired of him (saying): "Well, Cailte my soul, why was this place called Fert Fiadmoir ('Fiadmor's Gravemound') and why was this height to the west called 'Circall's Hill,' and why was the hill beside it called 'Congna's Hill?", Cailte answered this question, because he knew what it referred to.

Find mac Cumaill had a good, very loveable daughter named Aé Arduallach, and Fiadmor, son of Arist, king of Alba in the east, sought her of her father. Find said that, if she herself wished to wed Fiadmor, he, Find, would not refuse him. So the question was put to the damsel, and she said that she would never sleep with a husband outside Erin. Then said Find to his daughter: "I will give thee, my daughter, to the man whom thou hast refused, even to the king of Alba." Now the girl had a lover in the Fianns of Erin, namely Ailbe Airmderg ('Redweapon') from Athlis, from the borders of Feeguile, and Ae said to him: "Ailbe, my soul, how wilt thou deal with me, and Find giving me to the king of Alba?" Then Ailbe answered: "Go under the safeguard of Goll, son of Morna, and of the Fiann of Erin, not to have compulsory wooing upon thee." Then the damsel bound her safeguard on the three equal families that were in the Fiann, namely, on the Children of Morna, the Children of Báiscne, and the Children of Nemnann. And she binds her safeguard on the whole of the Fiann, and the Fiann accept it.

And this is the time and season that Fiadmor, king of Alba, with three great battalions, came to the Strand of Eothaile. His two brothers, Circull and Congna, were along with him; and a message came from them to Find, even to this cairn, (demanding) Fiadmor's wife. But the damsel refused: so Fiadmor said that unless she were given him, battle against the Fiann would be proclaimed by the king of Alba. And he declared that he would not leave Ireland until either his wife was given him, dead or alive, or the head of Find. Then said Find: "Let three of you go to Ess na n-én ('the Cataract of the Birds') — today called Ess Dara — and keep watch and ward against the foreigners who are on the beautiful Strand of Eothaile in the north." So we three Fianns obeyed that order, myself and Diarmait O' Duibni and Oscar, son of Ossian. And as we reached the end of the strand we beheld three huge men approaching us, and the six of us warriors met in the midst of the strand. We asked tidings of them, and they said that the king of Alba was there — three warriors in all — himself and his two brothers, Circall and Congna, — to seek a 'chance of slaughter' on the Fiann.

"By my word," says Cailte, "if ye desire the Fiann to suffer shame or want, ye should put your face upon us, and (then) we should be naught in Find's opinion." "And if," says the king of Alba, "in his opinion ye were lacking, what is it to us that ye are not lacking to him?"

"So then," says Cailte, "we fought a duel, bloody, aggressive, truly-venomous. Hands were moved quickly, blows were dealt boldly, hearts were hardened, and feet were stayed."

The sequel of the story of the Lawn of Reproach[1].

(Text: lines 6626—6631.)

And a basin of pale gold with water in it, was brought to Find, and he washes his face and his hands, and puts his thumb beneath his tooth of knowledge; and the truth was revealed to him, and he prophesied that saints and righteous men would come thither, and said:

The ridge over the lough will be a peaceful church, though after this a place of kingfolks: honour on 'the Lawn of Reproach' will come at the end of the world.

The Tale of Rodub and Aifi the Red.

(Text: lines 6632—6690).

And then the hosts came westward to Cluain Carpait ('Chariot-lawn') in Breccthír — which is now called Fírchuing ('True-yoke'). Patrick's chariot broke there, and after the fracture of the pole, the saint sat down on a mound of sods. They had not been there long when they saw (another) chariot approaching them, with a young lad therein. Red as valerian was each of his cheeks, blue as a hyacinth each of his eyes, white was every limb in his body, and black as coal was the shaggy mantle upon him. Thus he came towards them. "It would be profitable for thee, O man of the chariot", says Benén, "to help saint Patrick?" "Who is yon?" asks the young lad. "Patrick, son of Calpurn", says Benén, "head of the faith and the devotion of the men of Ireland." Then the lad got ont of his chariot, and laid his head on Patrick's breast, and said: "Not good is this chariot at breaking, and it is all for Patrick." "Grace without division (of district) to thee and thy son and thy grandson! And what surname hast thou, my boy?" asks Patrick[1]). "Dub ('Black'), son of Muirgius, son of Tomaltach, am I," he answered. "True it is", says Benén, "he is very black (rodub)'. 'My good doom!" says Patrick, "because of thy helpful service thy race and thy seed shall always be (called) Húi Roduib ('Rodub's descendants'). "My service, both living and dead, to thee (alone"), says the lad. "Nay," says Patrick, "at the end of a hundred years from today, thy living and thy dead will belong to God and to me for ever." And Patrick said:

[1] Lism. is here corrupt. The translation follows Fr., which has ca slondud tuisa, a maccaim? ar Patraic.

Rodub, of much grace will a multitude of his race partake henceforward: from him (descends) one of the three gifted families in the territory of Connaught of the mighty host, etc.

"And I permit," says Patrick, "the grindiugud (?) of every decree and every covenant in which one of thy race shall be concerned to be made in his favour, provided it be just. For lovingly (co grinn) hast thou bestowed the chariot upon me."

They had not been long there when they saw another chariot coming towards them, with two well-matched horses harnessed to it. Therein was a ruddy woman, wearing a red mantle, with a brooch of gold therein, and a frontlet of yellow gold at her forehead. She alighted, and laid her head on Patrick's breast, and knelt to him. "Who art thou, O damsel?" says Patrick. "Affi the Red, daughter of Conall Costadach, daughter of the king of Connaught, am I", quoth she. "I have vast and treasurous wealth, and I have come to consult with thee — for thou art the best man in Ireland —, as to whom I shall wed." "Behold him there," says Patrick, "at one of thy hands." "Who is he?" says the damsel. "Dub, son of Rodub,' says Patrick. "What bride-price and present has he for me?" asked the damsel. "What brideprice dost thou demand of the youth?" asks Patrick. "That I should be the only wife of him that marries me; for I do not deem it fitting that I should be left by him." "Dost thou accept that, O youth?" says Patrick. "I accept," the youth answers, "whatever thou tellest me to do." "If so, wed the damsel," rejoins Patrick, "and let thy children and thy family be by her, and grant her that condition." So thus he wedded her through saint Patrick's counsel. "But at present we have no land," says the damsel, "and that is sad." "Where is the king of Connaught?" asks Patrick. "Here, thou holy cleric," says the king. "Grant land for me to this couple, who gave me the right to advise them." Says the king: "the cantred of land that belongs to himself shall belong to them jointly." And so they parted from him.

The story of the raths of Cass and Conall.

That night the host came on to Berna na Con ('the Gap of the Hound'). The king over that country was then Tigernach, son of Conn the Mighty. When he heard the host approaching him, he got a fit of grudging and niggardliness, and he left his land and country, and fled from the king of Connaught and Patrick. Patrick heard this and said: 'I pray to God that the sway of another sept be on them for ever!" Then the host sat down on the two raths that were there, half the host at either rath.

Then the king of Connaught asked Cailte: "What are these two raths on which we are?" "Two of Find's dear warriors dwelt therein, even Conall Coscurach and Cobthach Cass, two sons of the king of Tyrconnell in the north, two heroes and battle-soldiers and 'hurdles of a gap of hundreds.' They had in Ireland inveterate foes, even the clans of Morna, and this was the cause of their enmity. A hunt of Slieve Gam was held by Find and the Fiann of Erin, and Conán the Bald, son of Morna, chanced to be hunting along with the men on that day. Now he was the mellgalach of the household, and the quarrelsome one of the council, and the contentious one of the assembly; and he never sought justice from any one, and he cursed the man who gave justice to him; and through Conan the Bald's curse the whole clan Morna died and perished. Now a fierce savage stag was started by them there, and at him Conan cast his spear. The two sons of the king of Tyrconnell also cast their spears at the stag, so that they passed cross-wise through him. Said Conan: "Let go the deer, my men." "We will not let go," say the men. "Ye have not killed him more than I, and it was I that first wounded him." "By our word," say the men, "even though thou woundedst him, he will not be yielded to thee; but we will give thee Find's award." And Conan answered banningly: 'Curse on him who shall give me justice, and I will not give it to anyone." Then Conall raised his hand and dealt Conan a blow with the shaft of his spear, and left on him a lump and a mark as thick as the spearshaft. Then the bulk of the Fiann came between them, and thus there was an intervention.

Howbeit, Conan neither shewed grudge nor made reproach, till the Children of Morna began plundering and robbing Find. They were killing his fostersons and his dear ones; and they came", says Cailte, "to Forba na fer ('the Men's heritage'), which is now called Lenna in baili.

Then said Conan to Goll: "knowest thou, Goll, thou royal champion, that the blow of a spearshaft was given me at the hunt of Slieve Gam, by the son of the king of Tyrconnell, and I desire to go and avenge that on them tonight. "By our word," says Goll, "we should not wish a friend of ours to fight them, for they have the 'grunting of a single pig's brood.' Says Conan: "I will attack them with four hundred warriors." So he and two sons of of his brothers, named Taman and Trén, arose, and, with the four hundred warriors, came to this place in the very middle of the day. But four hundred then attacked them," says Cailte, "and Taman and Trén straightway fell by the two sons of the king of Tyrconnell. And no one (on either side) escaped to tell the tale or earn the wage, save Conan alone, with the sling of his shield round his neck; and he fared forth till he reached the place where his (other) brothers were biding.

"Bad is this journey, O Conan," say these brothers. "Through thee have we fallen, and two sons of our brothers, and the four hundred men who marched with thee." "So those eight hundred warriors," says Cailte, "were buried here, and their gravestones were raised over their graves, and thereon their ogham-names were inscribed." And Cailte said:

The raths of Conall and Cobthach Cass are under the green-swarded hill: there they are from that to this in the mound continually, etc.

"Great is the knowledge and true wisdom that thou hast told us, O Cailte," says the king of Connaught.

The story of Patrick's Well and the nine Witches.

(Text: lines 6759—6788).

Then the whole host, having Patrick with them, fared westward to the Witches' Brake, now called Patrick's Well. And the king of the country, whose name was Conn the Mighty, visited Patrick. "And tell us," says Cailte, "why this is called the Witches' Brake?" "There were nine women," [says Conn], "who were practising witchcraft, and they let from them neither woman nor man without being killed, and thus for the space of twenty years they were wasting the heritage and the land. And Conn said to Patrick: "Holy cleric, my soul, drive from us the witches and the ill-luck that are ruining the country and the ground."

Then said Patrick: "Where is the 'son of the hours'?" "Here, thou holy cleric," says he. "Look thou if there is water near us." "I see none here," says the ecclesiastic. Then Patrick raised his hand and thrust his (pastoral) staff against the ground, whence a clear, pellucid well brake forth. And Patrick blessed the water, and said:

The water we have here, saith sinless Patrick, 'twill be famous with every one, the shining radiant well.

"I grant," says Patrick, "protection for three days and three nights to whomsoever drinks aught of it, and help and succour to him in every misfortune."

And they were not long there till they saw the nine dark, savage witches approaching them; and if the dead were wont to rise out of the ground they would have uttered the screams which were made on every side of them. But Patrick took the holy water and sprinkled it on the witches, and they fled from him to the Isle of Wailing — now called the Isle of the Shrine, — in Findloch Cera. And there they heard the wail from them at the end. The host afterwards sat down on the mound of sods, and then the king of Connaught said: "'Tis a good cleric's hunting you have shewn to the demons, O cleric!"

Cailte's Visit to Assaroe.

(Text: 6789—6918).

Then said Cailte to Patrick: "knowest thou, O holy cleric, the misfortune that befell me in the banded battle of Howth in the east?" "What misfortune is that?" asks Patrick. 'Mane, son of the king of Norway, had a virulent spear, and no one struck by it ever escaped without death or blemish. There were a hundred valiant warriors fighting against me in the battle, and I was at the head of the fray when, without my perceiving it, Mane made a cast at me in the centre of the battle. I knew not whence the cast came, but I heard the noise and rushing sound of the spear as it sped to me, and I lifted my shield to guard my head and my body. But this did not help me, for the spear struck below on the calf and sinew of my leg, and left its venom in the leg, so that I am compelled to go and seek for help and succour." "Whither dost thou desire to go?" asks Patrick. "Northward to Aed Minbrecc of Assaroe," says Cailte, "for he has a wife, even Bé-bind daughter of Elcmar of the Brugh, and she has the Tuath dé Danann's draught of leechdom and healing, and with her is all that remains of Goibniu's ale, and 'tis she that dealt it to them. And brief were my guidance and my road if Find mac Cumaill were alive, and Ossian and Diarmait and Oscar!' And then he uttered the lay:

Guidance to me from (this) country northward, to the Cataract of Modorn of the mighty host, to have my leg healed, so that my journey may be the longer, etc.

"And where is Cass corach, son of Caincenn?' asks Cailte. 'Here, my soul," says Cass corach. "Arise and take thy lute upon thee so that we may wend our way." And they arose, and a paternoster was recited for them, and Patrick said to Cailte: "At the end of the year there is an assembly at Tara of the men of Erin. Come thither to meet us and the men of Erin, that thou mayst relate some of thine own great deeds of valour, and the deeds of Find and the Fianns of Erin." Cailte agreed to this, and said: "What thing soever thou hast told me, that will I do." "'Tis meet for thee to say that," quoth Patrick, "for to me thou art dear and loveable." Then Cailte bade farewell to Patrick and to the king of Connaught and the whole host, and forth they fared to the Elfmound of Druim Nemed, — now called Síd Duma — in Luigni of Connaught. When they reached the green of the elfmound they saw a youth clad in a green mantle with a brooch of gold therein, and on his head a golden diadem, and what he was singing was melodious music. Cass corach came, and the youth bestowed three kisses upon him. "What," says Cailte, "is the cause of thy friendship, for hitherto he has been unknown to thee?" 'Good cause have we,' replied the youth; "we have the same mother." "And what is thy name, my boy?" asks Cailte. 'Fer-maisse ('man of beauty'), son of Eogabal, is my name," says the youth. "Meseems it is not an excessive name for thee," says Cailte, "for thy beauteousness is sufficient."

"Come ye into the house," says the youth. "I will not go," says Cailte, "until thou gettest leave from the folk of the elfmound, lest the blame of my intrusion be put on thee.' Then the youth entered the elfmound, and told this to Fergus Fairhair, the Dagda's son. "Go out for them," say they, "and bring them into the elfmound, for never have we heard of a warrior's son in his time better than Cailte." So they were brought into the elfmound, and were well entertained with all the best they had, and there they abode for the space of a night.

"Well, Cailte, my soul", says Fergus, the Dagda's son, "I have a swordhilt, and I wish thee to put it to rights, for the Tuath dé Danann have refused to do so." "Let it be placed in my hand," says Cailte. So the sword was delivered to him, and for the whole fair day till night he was arranging it, and he finished it by night, and put it complete into Fergus' hand.

"And knowest thou, Cailte, my soul, our real reason for repairing that sword?" "Truly I know not", says Cailte. "A warrior has long been at enmity with the Tuath dé Danann, namely, Garb, son of Tarb, king of Norway in the north. And he, with Eolus his brother, comes to us every third year with a great fleet. And thus they come, having with them a she-brave named Bé drecain, daughter of Herod, and nothing is hidden to her, from elfmound to elfmound of the Tuath dé Danann. For a woman of magical formation fostered her, and hence there are no jewels or treasures or valuables in the mounds that she does not succeed in carrying off by her knowledge. And she brings a host and a multitude to the midst of every elfmound of the Tuath dé Danann, to sack and harry them. And behold the spear in thy hand," says he, "fit it (to a spearhead) against that she-brave." So he put the spear into his hand, and Cailte fitted it. "And behold," says he, "the barbed javelin in thy hand: fit it against the third of them" (Eolus). So Cailte took the shaft, and it broke in its socket, and seven shafts were brought to him, and they too broke in the socket. But the eighth shaft that was put into his hand, he fitted skilfully and strongly. 'Blessed," says Fergus, "were he who should get a friend to undertake that the three against whom these weapons were made should fall by them!" "What names (have) these weapons?" asks Cailte. 'Blood of mangling' is the name of the sword," answers Fergus, "and 'War-like Woman' is the name of the spear, and 'Drink of death' the name of the javelin." "It was my fate", says Cailte, "to do some deed for which the men of Erin and Alba and the Tuath dé Danann would be thankful. I did it not in my youth. Who knows but that my fate is that I should do it today?'

"Who shall fall by the sword?" says Cass Corach. 'The she-brave," answered Fergus. "Who shall fall by the javelin?' says Fer-maisse. "One of the two kings of the world or of Norway, or of Erin," says Fergus, son of the Dagda. "And who shall fall by the spear?" says Cailte. "Garb, son of Tarb, king of Norway: the Tuath dé Danann have a prophecy that by it he will fall." "Let the spear be in my hand," says Cailte.

After that they remained there for three days and three nights. Then they bade farewell to the folk of the elfmound, and brought those weapons with them. Fer maisse accompanied them, and they fared forth to the Cataract of the Birds, now called the Cataract of the Oak, and to the Bridge of the Nines, now called the Bridge of Maiming, and northward to the Red Ridge of the Fiann, now called Druim cliab, and over the Ford of the Grey Stag, and to the Wood of the Contention, (now) called Buadnatán's Church, and to the Grave of the Champion, where the pig fashioned by magic killed Diarmait O'Duibni, and northward into the Plain of Cétne, son of Allguba, — where their tribute used to be delivered to the tribe of Fomorians by the men of Erin, i.e. the Tuatha dé Danann, — and up to the Footstep of Assaroe and to the Height of the Boys, where the boys of the Tuath dé Danann used to play their hockey. In front of the elfmound were Aed of Assaroe and Ilbrecc of Assaroe; and they welcomed Cailte without guile or fraud.

"Dear to us is this welcome!" says Cailte. And then Bé-bind, daughter of Elcmar of the Brugh, came forth surrounded by her thrice fifty fair women, and sat down on the turfen mound, and gave three kisses, lovingly, fervently, to each of the twain, Cass corach and Fer-maisse. And the folk of the elfmound welcomed them and Cailte; and they said: "Bad were your friendship if ye heard that we were in great necessity and came not to succour us!' "Not for prowess was I prayed (to come)," says Cass corach; "but when ye deem it fitting or desirable for me to shew my skill I will display it unto you." "Not at all for valorous deeds have we come hither", says Fer maisse; "but we will help you when ye need." Then Cailte related his errand and his journey to the folk of the elfmound. "We will leech thee well", say they. And then they (all) entered the mound, and abode therein, for three days and three nights, carousing and making merry.

And a man who came to the door of the elfmound reported that the haven was full of vessels and boats, and that a vast army had landed on the shore above. "And it cannot be counted." Cailte said:

This is the number that has come hither, a thousand vessels . . . . they came to the end of the strand, scythe-heads and long-ships.

"Well, Cailte, my soul, my royal champion!" say they, "what is meet for us to do?" "Ye should ask them for a truce",[1] answers Cailte, "until the Tuath dé Danann make a gathering and a muster." And thus was it done. The Tuath dé Danann assembled, so that on the morrow there were twelve battalions on the green of the elfmound. And envoys came to them from the fleet, saying to the men of Erin: "Let the Tuath dé Danann give us hostages." "How shall that be done, O Cailte?" said the folk of the elfmound and the chiefs of the Tuath dé Danann. Answered Cailte: "Let us send these twelve battalions of ours to the end of the shore to observe them." So those twelve battalions marched forward, and Cailte said: "Hath any of you a . . . chariot?" "I have," says Midir Yellowmane, a son of the Dagda. So it was brought to them, and Cailte got into the chariot, and the spear (called) Warlike Woman, was given to him. The outlanders arranged a fence of shields about them; but then Cailte set his left knee against the chariot, and put his valorous fore-finger into the thong of the spear, and delivered a cast at the king of Norway, so that the spear sped straight to him and miserably broke his back in twain. The king fell in the midst of his army, and his soul thus parted from his body. And Cailte said:

Garb was slain at the beginning, amid his host in the van. Cailte killed him with his virulence, by a fatal cast that was cruel.

Then his people carried king Garb into his vessel, and the army said: "A great deed the man has done, to have killed with a single cast him who was best in the world!"

Hence 'the Shore of Garb' is the name of the shore after him.

Then said the she-brave to the host: "Board your ships", quoth she, "and I will face the Tuath dé Danann." And then Cass Corach enquired of the Tuath dé Danann: "Have ye for me a hard and strong shield?"

How Cailte and his comrades killed three birdflocks from Sliab Fuait.

(Text: lines 7126—7137.)

That was the time and season that three ruddy beautiful birdflocks came from the borders of Sliab Fuait in the north to the green of this elfmound. They ate the grass down to the gravel and bedrock and bare flagstones. Ilbrecc sang:

Three bald flocks, ruddy, thick, beautiful, come and graze the green, leaving not enough for a single race.

"What are yon?" asked Cailte. "Three birdflocks that come to us every year, and they leave nothing on the green outside without eating it down to the gravel and bedrock." Then Cailte and his comrades threw three throwing-stones that lay before them, and the birdflocks fell thereby. "Take success and a blessing!" say the elves: "good is the deed ye have done."

Cailte's running and the Chase of Sliab Lugda.

(Text: lines 7354—7398.)

They fared forward to Les na mban ('the Garth of the Women') on Cúil Radairc, now called Coolavin, and entered the fortress, where they were well served that night. There they remained till the morrow, when day came with its full radiance. And then his left leg caused pain to Cailte for the day, and kept him from walking. And a warrior of the house was saying to him: "Great the vigour that has been shewn by that leg, though tonight it is in sickness and ill health!" And Cailte uttered the lay:

I ran from Tara of the troops — this is truth and no lie — thrice I carried off from it three score hundred first bloods.

"For the truth of thy valour and gallantry, O Cailte, thou king of the Fiann," says Blathmec, "tell us the cause of thy racing against them." Then said Cailte:

The first of the runs that I made brought many to grief, when I took — fair was my run — a couple of every wild animal. The run that was next thereto — 'tis the truth and no falsehood — when I put . . . under a cliff the . . . and . . . of Erin.

"Great was that vigour, O Cailte," says Blathmec. "It was great," answered Cailte; "for from one day to the next I sped from Tonn Clidna in the south to Tonn Rudraigi in the north." And Cailte said:

This is my run on the third day — 'tis the truth and no falsehood — when I cast calves to cows in beautiful, chilly Erin.

"And that, Blathmec, my soul, is the cause of those runs as to which thou didst enquire."

Then they heard the concert of three packs of hounds hunting round the head of Sliab Lugda with Taiglech, son of Ailill, king of the Connaught Luigni. "What is this chase, O Cailte?" says Blathmec. "A chase by three packs of hounds, with three quarries ahead of them." "What are those quarries?" asks Blathmec. "The chief chase which the packs achieve is the chase of fierce wild stags and bulky hinds." "And this pack after them?" asks the warrior. "That is the melodious chase by beagles after swift and gentle hares." "And this third pack?" says Blathmec. "That is the furious and urgent chase after heavy boars, killing them vehemently." "What is this fourth chase, O Cailte," asked Blathmec. "The chase of heavy-sided, low-bellied badgers." And behind the hunt they heard the shout of the gillies, and the swiftest of the boys, and the readiest of the warriors, and the men who were the straightest shots, and the strong slaves who bore the greatest burdens. On that day Cailte and Blaithmec were at the rear of the hunt; but the warrior (Blaithmec) went forth to see them (the packs); and just as Cailte had said, so they were.

Cass corach's marriage, the Praise of Find, and the beginning of the story of the Hill of Guidance.

"And thou, Cass corach," said Cailte, "what is thy mind about her?" "My mind is this," he answered, "that of the world's women never have I seen one that pleased me better than yon damsel." "What then," asked Cailte, "hinders you from coming to an agreement?" "(Be it) according to thy will and thy counsel," replies the damsel. "The men of Erin will be holding the Feast of Tara," says Cailte, "and there thou wilt be given to Cass corach, and the ollaveship of Erin and Alba will be conferred upon him, and thou wilt be wedded to him with the rights of a single wife." "When will the Feast of Tara be held?" asked Cass corach. "At the end of a quarter hence," answered Cailte.

Thereafter Cailte was lauding Find, and then he said this:

"Better than all that have come of Banba's host, both kings and crownprinces, is Find, the high battle-soldier of Allen."

"Great is that testimony, my soul," said Patrick. "It is not (too) great," rejoined Cailte; "for were there seven tongues in my head, and seven sages' eloquence in each tongue, not half nor a third of his excellence would be uttered by me as to Find." And this was his reason; because Find had never refused aught to anyone, provided he had a head to consume (the food bestowed on him) and legs to go away (with the rest of the bounty). And Cailte said:

Him that no one would leave in his house Find would leave in his house: besides that, he would be with Find so long as he was alive.

"Success and benison attend thee!" says Patrick: "well hast thou said thy say."

After that the hosts fared forward to Cnoc in Eolairi, to the north-west of Cruachan. "O Cailte, why was this hill called Cnoc in Eolairi?" asked Patrick. "The one man of the children of Adam and of the comely human throng whose shape was best was Eolair, son of the King of the great world in the east; and he, with nine hundred wolfdogs and nine hundred servants and nine hundred warriors, made his covenants and his fellowship with Find.

(For the rest of this story see Silva Gadelica II 260 261.)

The story of Bairnech and the slaying of Scothniam.

(Text: lines 7597—7677.)

And thereafter they bade the damsel farewell, and came on southwards to the Hillock of the Assembly, now called the Cairn of Fraech, son of Fidach. They found before them on the cairn a man whose hair was rough and very gray. He wore a dun mantle with a hollow pin of bronze therein: in his hand was a long staff of white hazel, and in front of him was a herd of kine in a fenced grass-field. Cailte sat down beside him on the hill. "Who art thou, my soul, my warrior?" asks Cailte. "Bairnech, son of Carbh, am I," answers the warrior, "the steward of the king of Erin, even Diarmait mac Cairill; and in this district I hold land from the king of Erin." "Whence is thy origin, my soul?" says Cailte. "From Collamair of Bregia in the east," says the warrior. "And knowest thou," says Cailte, "who was the best that ever came out of Collamair?" "I know, and the men of Erin and Alba know. 'Tis Cailte, son of Rónán; and dost thou know where that warrior is?" "I know," answers Cailte. "He is making a circuit of Erin wheresoever his comrades and his fosterbrothers used to be in his company; and I am that man," says Cailte, "and I am thy first cousin, for we have the same grandsire."

Then Cailte bestowed upon him three kisses, lovingly and fervently, and Bairnech made a beautiful welcome before him. "And 'tis thy right way thou hast come, my soul, my royal champion," says he; "and at the end of a week hence comes Patrick along with the nobles of Connaught to the Druid's Grave", — which is now called Geidech's Grave — "and do thou abide in thy cousin's house, partaking of food and ale; and though formerly thou didst repair to it with a greater number of Fiann and people, thou wouldst get welcome until the Adze-head comes to thee. And in this district," says Bairnech, "we have great troubles." "Which be they?" asked Cailte. "I have many herds of kine, and on Halloween in every year a woman comes to us out of the elfmound of Cruachain, and the nine best cows in every herd she takes, and there is no pursuing her, so that she gets (back) into the elfmound. And neither myself nor my sons," says the warrior, "are athletes; for our share of vigour and might is in thee and in the two sons that thou hadst, namely Colla and Faelán." "Good indeed was Colla's vigour," says Cailte. "What vigour had he beyond the other son?" asks the warrior. "It chanced that he played a match at draughts one night on the rampart of Tara, because the wife of Bind Bóinde, the steward of Tara, had fallen in love with him; and they — that is, Colla and the Fianns of Erin — had a match at running and draught-playing. "How would ye fain have the race?' says Colla to the Fiann. "Let you, the three battalions of the Fiann, set your faces in one direction, and I will run backwards"[1]). And thus the race was run, and he took away the draughtboard from the Fianns of Erin. And he went over the summit of Benn Étair out into the sea, and was drowned therein. And alas," says the warrior, "that it is not he whom I have met (?), for (then) my cows would not be lifted without vengeance."

"Cass corach," says Cailte, "knowest thou which of the Tuath dé Danann yon damsel is?" "I know," he answered: "it is Scothniam, daughter of Cassirne, the wizard. Out of the elfmound of Cruachan here she makes this plunder upon thee. Cathmog, son of Fircherp, the son of the king of Bregia and Meath, killed the damsel's father and grandsire, and she is taking vengeance (for them) on each of you, one after the other."

Then they fared forward to the warrior's stronghold, Less na Fleide ('The Garth of the Feast') on the western side of Fraech's Cairn, and there they were well tended for three days and three nights. "Well, my soul, my warrior," says Cailte, "meseems that tonight is Halloween." "If it be," says the warrior, "'tis then that the damsel comes to plunder and rob us." "O Cailte," asks Cass corach, "how would it be for me to go tonight to the door of the elfmound?" "Go, my soul, and take thy weapons, and cast thy spear." So he went. And not long afterwards he saw the damsel passing by them out of the elfmound: a beautiful, one-coloured mantle about her, with a brooch of gold therein: a smock of yellow silk at her skin, a knot of the smock between her thighs, two spears in her hands; and she had no great fear from the side she faced, and little was her fear from the side behind her. Then Cass Corach blew a blast against her, and placed his forefinger of valour into the thong of the spear that lay in his hand, and hurled the spear at the girl, so that it lodged in her bosom and broke the heart in her breast.

Cailte sang:

Cass corach of the melodies killed the furious girl — 'twas no sin: at the door of the elfmound in the north, and in one hour triumphed over[1] her.

And then he beheaded her, and brought the head to the warrior and to Cailte. "Behold," said he, "O warrior, the head of the girl that used every year to wreak plundering and robbery upon thee." And after that they were there for three days and three nights.

The story of the three She-wolves.

(Text: lines 7678—7729.)

Then said the same man: "Cailte, my soul, knowest thou the other persecution which I suffer in this country?' "What persecution, my soul?' asks Cailte. 'Three she-wolves issue every year from the Cave of Cruachan, and destroy all our wethers and sheep, and we get no chance at them till they retreat again into the Cave. Blessing on the friend by whom they shall be driven from us!" "Well, Cass corach, my soul," says Cailte, "knowest thou what are the three wolves that plunder the warrior?" "Truly I know," answered Cass corach; "three daughters of Airitech, of the rear of the Oppressive Company, from the Cave of Cruachan. "'Tis easier for them to plunder as wolves than as human beings. And they trust to no one?" says Cailte. "They trust only to one set." "What is that set?" asks Cailte. "If they were to see harps and lutes with the world's men, they would trust to them." "Then they will trust to (the minstrel) Cass corach," says Cailte. "And whither are they wont to come?" "To Bricriu's Cairn here," replies the warrior. "And how would it be for me," says Cass corach, 'to go tomorrow and carry my lute to the top of the cairn?" So, early on the morrow, he arose, and went to the top of the cairn, and kept playing and performing on his lute until the fall of the evening clouds. And as he was there, he beheld the three wolves coming towards him, and they lay down before him, listening to the music. But Cass corach found no means of attacking them, and at the close of day they went away from him northward to the Cave. Cass corach came back to Cailte and tells him this tale. "Go there again tomorrow," says Cailte, "and say to them that, for listening to music and minstrelsy, they would be better in shapes of humans than in shapes of wolves." So on the morrow Cass corach fared forth to the same cairn, and he ranged his people around it, and the wolves came thither, and couched on their forelegs, listening to the music. Then Cass corach kept saying to them: "If ye were humans," quoth he, "by origin, listening as humans to the music would be better for you than listening to it as wolves." And they heard this, and cast off the long dark coverings that were round them, for dear to them was the entrancing (?) music of the elves. And as they were side by side and elbow by elbow, Cailte beheld them, and put his forefinger of valour into the thong of the spear, so that the spear in its virulent course passed through three of the women, and landed in the top of the breast of her that was farthest from him. And thus they were on the spear, like a skein close-drawn together. As Cailte said:

[1] I take commáig to be misspelt for commáid.

Cailte with his venom killed the strange unknown trio, so that they fell, etc.

Then Cass corach went to them, and struck off their three heads. So from then till now the Glen of the Wolf-shapes is the name of the glen on the northern side of Bricriu's Cairn.

"Good is the prowess thou hast wrought, O Cailte!" says Cass corach: "today it was not an old man's prowess, and well it was for thy minstrel to be in thy company." "And what better" [says Cailte], "is the prowess that I wrought than the prowess of the minstrel? For thou beguiledst them from the shapes of wolves into the shapes of humans."

Then they fared forward to the warrior's fortress, having the heads of those three women as prize of slaughter and triumph; and there they abode for three days and three nights.

The death of the king of Connaught's wife: Patrick's meeting with Cailte and Cass corach; and the king's wedding with Aillenn.

(Text: lines 7726—7843.)

That was the time and season when saint Patrick reached the Druid's Grave, now called 'the Grave of Gedech, a bishop of Patrick's community, who dwelt there. Or it was Gedech, Maive and Ailill's wizard, who fell there. And thither came Aed son of Muredach, king of Connaught, to Raith cháirech Medba ('the rath of Maive's sheep'), now called the Mairtine of Conra's son. And on that night a sore lung-disease attacked the king of Connaught's wife, Bé bind, daughter of Eochaid Redside, king of Leinster; and there she died, and was buried in Ard na n-Aingel ('the Height of the Angels') — now called Uarán Garaid — for thrice did a thousand angels come thither to speak with Patrick when he was reciting his (canonical) hours.

Thereafter came the king of Connaught to the Druid's Grave, where saint Patrick was biding; and they made a gathering and muster of the province of Connaught from Liac Essa Lomanaig ('the Flagstone of Lomanach's cataract'), now called Limerick, to Ess Ruaid meic Moduirn ('the Cataract of Ruad son of Modorn', Assaroe).

As to Cailte, he and his people fared forward from the Garth of the Women to the place where Patrick was staying with the nobles of Connaught, and there he laid his head on Patrick's breast. And the Connaught nobles welcomed Cailte and Cass corach. "By our word," say they, "never since you parted from us have we seen twain that were dearer to us than you." "By my word," says Cailte, "never since Find departed, have I seen a band that was dearer to me than you." And Cass corach arose, and laid his head on Patrick's breast, and knelt to him. "Palm of eloquence on thee, my son," says Patrick; "and let every third word uttered by men of thine art seem melodious to every hearer, and let one of them possessed of thy skill always be a king's bedfellow and the torch of every assembly!" And unto Patrick the arrival of that pair was a delight of spirit and nature.

Then Patrick asked Cailte's tidings from the time they separated till Cailte came to him again. And Cailte told him true tidings. 'Well, Brocán," says Patrick, "let Cailte's tidings be written down and revised by thee, so that they may not be lost, and that they may be a pastime to the multitudes and the nobles of the end of time."

"And holy Patrick," says Cailte, "what are thy tales and tidings from the time I parted with thee till today?" "Here they are for thee," says Patrick: "Maelán, and Mugán, and Brothrachán, and Dubchú of the Wiles have been banished from Oenach Derg" — now called Achad Abair Umaill.

Patrick sang:

The well which I left in the land, and my two untroubled salmon: they will remain there till the white Judgment, I will tell thee, O dear Cailte.

"Fer benn, and Fer boga, and Fer gabla, three brothers who were doing evil and injustice in the west of Ireland, and three hundred thousand demons round the Cruach (Croaghpatrick), I drove them forth into the sea over Ailén in tṡnáma" ('the Isle of the Swimming-place"), — wherefore it is now called Ailén na ndeman 'the Isle of the Demons.'

Patrick sang:

My bird and my water and my eagle, and my beautiful holy Cruach: they will be a safeguard from me to every one in transgression.

"And well, holy Patrick, my soul," says Benén Mór, son of Aed, "what dost thou ordain to be our word as to that (place) for all who go to the earth of the Cruach and drink the water of the Dabar?" "They shall be in thy power, both old and young. And I have left (my word) that the place be a place of the holy and true, and that whosoever shall there commit evil or wrong or fraud shall have decay of children and kindred and people; but my blessing to him who shall honour it and defend it!"

"So these, Cailte, my soul," says Patrick, "are my tidings and adventures during the year that thou hast been absent from me."

"Success and benison attend thee, holy Patrick!" says Cailte: "great is the profit thou hast left in that place to the Gaels."

On that night then, his tent was spread over Patrick, and a camp was pitched by the king of Connaught for a fortnight and a month, until the five great provinces of Erin should come to hold the Feast of Tara. And they built a secret secluded house for Cailte between the king's house and Patrick's tent — the reason why it was so built being that each of the two (the king and the saint) might have the enjoyment of listening to him.

Then Cass corach took his lute and sent them into a long slumber and sleep. And they rose on the morrow, and a draughtboard was brought them to be played upon. Three of the men were found lacking, and the king averred that none like them were to be gotten in Erin or Alba. Then said Cailte: "Do not play until I go and seek a draughtboard which once upon a time I beheld when hiding it." So forth he fared eastward to the head of Sliab Clithair, — now called Sliab Baghna —, and out before the the elfmound (there) he saw a solid pillar-stone. Round the pillar he put his arms and heaved it out of the earth, and there was a strong lid of stone on a draughtboard in the place of the pillar, and a lid beneath it. And he lifted out the Solustairtech, the draughtboard of Goll son of Morna, and took therefrom three men of gold and three men of silver. Then he put the board into the same two compact coverings of stone, and came back to the king of Connaught, and placed the men in his hand; and each of them was as big as the fist of the biggest man in the host. "And was there nothing more than this?" quoth the king. "There was indeed," says Cailte — "thrice fifty men of gold and thrice fifty men of silver." "What induced thee," rejoined the king, "not to bring me the board?" 'It was not a draughtboard that thou askedst of me, but three men for playing draughts, and I gave thee gein ocus athgein[1]; and I will not stir the board from the place into which the warrior to whom it belongs put it." So then the men were put back on the board. "And who owned the board?" asks the king of Connaught. "Goll son of Morna," answered Cailte. "Pity he did not give it to thee for me!" says the king. "Set not thyself against him, O king: for I will never give thee the board." And he gave nothing more to his retinue.

They had not been there long when they saw Aillenn Fial-chorcra, daughter of Bodb the Red, son of the Dagda, coming to them, with thrice fifty Tuath dé Danann ladies in her company. The damsel sat down on the turfen mound along with St Patrick and the king of Connaught, and told them her errand. "And what is thy reply to her, O king of Connaught?" says Patrick. "Whatever thou mayst say and wish me to do, that I will do," says the king. "I wish to marry her to thee," says Patrick, "for I promised her that thou wouldst wed her, provided she rejected her false druidic belief and knelt to the Gospel of the King of heaven and earth." "Dost thou agree to that, O damsel?" asks the king. "I agree," replies the damsel. So she and her train of ladies arose, and they all knelt to Patrick, and Patrick joined her and the king in wedlock, and as authors reckon, that was the first marriage that the Adzehead performed in Ireland. "And the wedding-fee?" says Benén Mór. "Ye shall have," says the king, "the choice of the homesteads of every tribe from Liac Lomenaig" — now called Limerick — "to the Flagstone of Assaroe." "And," says Benén, "the fee from thee in return, O Patrick, to the folk of the province?" "I will grant," says Patrick, "that three kings of their race shall capture Erin, and the prosperity of Erin at the end shall be theirs without extinction." Then Brocán wrote down those blessings[1] on the province of Connaught, and also all that had been given to Patrick. And on that night, after the feast of bedding and handspreading, that couple slept together, even Aed, son of Muredach, and Aillenn Fialchorcra, daughter of Bodb the Red.

The story of the Stone of the Mistake.

On the morrow the king rose early, and upon the hill hard by them was a huge mass of rock. The king set his back to the pillar stone, and inquired of Cailte: "Why was this stone called Lia in imracail '(The Stone of the Mistake')?"

"Once upon a time," says Cailte, "when the sons of Morna came to Cuaill Cepain in Echtge of Connaught, plundering and robbing Find and the Fiann, we, three battalions of the Fiann, marched southward to the top of Slieve Cairn in the district of Corcomroe. And Find was doubtful as to the doings of the sons of Morna, that is, he knew not whether they had gone southward into Munster or past them northward into the province of Connaught. So he ordered his own two sons, Uillenn and Cainee, to march with their Fiann and their people into Munster to get news of the sons of Morna, and for the same purpose he despatched Aedán and Cathal, the two sons of the king of Ulaid, together with two hundred warriors, into the dear and beautiful province of Connaught. Now there were two sons of the king of Leinster in his (Find's) presence: their names were Conla and Cellach; and they, with (other) two hundred warriors, followed their fosterbrothers (Aedán and Cathal), and overtook them, so that in all they were four hundred warriors. They came to this place," says Cailte; "and every day they used to scout from Áth Colta to Áth Berrcha, seeking the Children of Morna, and every night they used to come here. And Find marvelled at the doings of his people, for no messenger reached him from them.

Then we, the three battalions of the Fiann, arose and found the track of the host before us, and it seemed to us to be the track of the Children of Morna: so we closed round them (at night), hand in hand, and killed them quickly, both gillie and warrior, the three [leg. four] hundred men that they were. But on the morrow, when day came with its full radiance, then we recognised our own people, and we uttered three great cries, bewailing those whom we had killed in error. And Find ordered a royal pillar-stone to be sought for those dear four, the two sons of the king of Ulaid and the two sons of the king of Leinster. So I," says Cailte, "and Ossian went to Ráith Medba" — now called Raith Chaerech Medba — "and there we found this stone, and we fetched it hither and planted it here above these men."

"Success and benison attend thee, Cailte my soul!" said the whole host. 'Great is the lore and the disclosure of truth which thou givest us upon all that is asked of thee!"

Hence this stone is called 'The Stone of the Mistake,' from the mistake of Find and the Fiann, when they killed their own people, supposing them to be the Children of Morna.

They mean: 'He was son of Dáire the Red, son of Finn, and of Lug, daughter of Finn i. e. a daughter, proper (or) improper, whom Find had, and all the women swore that she was Finn's proper daughter. But her own brother, after drinking ale in Temair Luachra, had lain with her, and on her begotten that son, to wit, Mac Lugach. And to the end of nine months she was pregnant there, and (then) bressa brige ocus ella came unto her, and she brought forth a manchild.' See infra, note on 4698.

789. aircet échta (earged echta, R. 17a 1, airget echt, Fr. 12b) is rendered in SG. II 120 by 'silver taken as spoil from the slain.' But échta (leg. echta) is O'Clery's eachda . i . glan 'pure', and seems cognate with Lat. aequum, and OHG. êhaft, now echt. With Crede's lintel (fordoros) of silver cf. the ἀργύρεον ὑπερθύριον in the palace of Alcinous, Od. VII 90.

937. dúine deightheanna 'forts good (and) strong' (not 'holds of a good lord', SG. II 124).

938. snaidm druad 'wizard's knot', some magical contrivance for the defence of fortresses, reminding one of the knots of coloured thread made by the Babylonian priests and of the knotted amulets still used in Russia. Between this line and 939 Fr. 14ᵃ has the following quatrains:

Cailigh fedha os maeth cluain . ergid re gredhain gaethsluaigh, 1384. is áithe cach delg as só 'every younger thorn is sharper', an ironical proverb (strangely misrendered in SG. II 134) applied to conceited youngsters. So luaithi mang iná máthair 'the fawn is swifter than the dam,' Corm. Tr. 118. Other proverbs occur in 3669, 4480, 6214, 6215.

1395. fial allata allmarda, Fr. 19a.

1397. Cumaill: Cúain, Fr. 19a.

1403. Guaire do gillasa fein . ar caman blarda a blaithsleib, Fr. 19a.

1411. A ardflaith airis ret ceill . do raid Oisin co caemgne, Fr. 19a.

1414. luaithbreith: lethbreath, Fr. 19a.

1415. barrtruim: barrduinn, Fr. 19a.

1424. rom caín tre áil, tre aithis, Fr. 19b.

1430. do gilla laeich Locha gair . ní can fathadh do buailed, Fr. 19b, which couplet lacks rhyme. For na fledh 'of the feasts', SG. i. 125 has na flath, which is rendered (ibid. II 135) by 'of the chiefs'.

1432. rot-fia screpull ofr cech fir . mad fó let a athcuingidh, Fr. 19b.

1440. sárbeim: salbeim, Fr. 19b.

1446. nach tachar rem tighernaib, Fr. 19b.

1450. Here in Fr. 19b 2 and pp. 20, 2 follows the story of Clidna, infra 3725 et seq., the account of Ráith Medba (ll. 3859—3870), Gort in fostada (ll. 3871—3879) and Ross Cailled (ll. 1451—1480).

1453. cnuc: carnd, Fr. 21.

1459. deich fichit: XXX. Fr. 21, and see line 1477.

1465. do thidlacad: d' indlucud, Fr. 21.

1470. (Bóinde): Boíndi, Fr. 21; (7 ro dhéch): 7 rodfécht, Fr. 21.

1477. Trichat do macaib righ rán . bái annsa teghlach tondbán, Fr. 22.

1479. Ni faca irchra mar sin riam . dar Mac Muire na morghiall, Fr. 22. The Ní faca urchra mar soin ('I never saw a perishing like that') of Lism. is misprinted Ní fada urchra mar soin in SG. i. 126, and misrendered, ibid. II 137, by 'Thus ... this was no long-drawn destruction.' Here in Fr. comes the passage printed infra as ll. 7547—7565, the story of the prophecy of Cainnelsciath (ll. 7577—7596), the decrepid Caeilte and his fairy-love Scothniam, (which reminds one of Tithonus and Aurora), the account of the hunt from Berrobail (3976—4049), the death of Dubchraide ('Blackheart' 4049—4053), and the origin of Ard Senaig (4054—4077).

1489. choicli: cloiceda, Fr. 24b, by metathesis for coicleda.

1497. cross-figil: This practice (praying with the arms stretched out in the form of a cross) is mentioned again in l. 4599. See O' Clery: Croisfighill .i. urnaighte no faire doní duine ar a ghlúinibh 7 a lámha sinte a gcrois.

1502. Es mac nEircc 'the Cataract of the sons of Erc', misprinted es meic Néira (sic) in SG. i. 126, and misrendered (ibid. II 137) 'the waterfall of Nera's son.'

1506. in fidhren: in fothrum 7 in fidhrén, Fr. 24b.

1526. Fr. 25 gives Diarmait only four sons (cethri maic).

1532. Dithrumach: Dithrebach, Fr. 25.

1536. ro tocsat fidhu re feirg, Fr. 25. ar in leirg ós Áth daim glais 'on the slope' ('upon the path', SG. II 43) above the Gray Stag's Ford.'

1537. in sleigh etc.: in tslegh tre gais is tre gail, Fr. 25.

1540. After the poem Fr. 25. inserts Ro ba maith an Fiann an la sin!

1542. Muadhnatan: mBuanata, Fr. 25. Mhaeilghairbh: Urgairb, Fr. 25.

1544—1546. dogniset fianboth fada urfairsing leo and, 7 ro egratar hí do seisc buncorcra deghgablanaigh o féici co fornosc, 7 dorighned indéonad ardberbad acco in adaigh sin, Fr. 25. Cf. for the thatching with sedge Iliad XXIV 450 καθύπερθεν ἔρεψαν λαχνήεντ' ὄροφον.

1552. cuach airgdidhi: an cuach féta findairgid, Fr. 26.

1556. seimnigi sodibraicthi: sithfaebraighi, Fr. 26.

1560. Mhoduirn: Modairnd maic Dalairc, Fr. 26.

1562. tonnglais: fondglais, Fr. 26.

1564. The 'white shield' (gelsciath) has already been mentioned in 231: cf. Δελφοβον λευκάσπιδα, Iliad XXII 294. 'The Irish covered their targets with leather, which they pipeclayed', SG. II 561.

1566. 'na laim . Ocus ar rochtain: ar fótaib faenglasa ina fiagnaisi, [leg. fiadnaisi] 7 ic dirghug*ud*, Fr. 26.

1574. mBromhac: mbrodhmucc, Fr. 26.

1577. atconnarcsa . . . comraic: it*con*dcamarne tú ac Ath Comair tess aitt i comraicend, Fr. 26.

1583. mo cliu cain 'my fair body' (cliu for clí 5662 = crí), misprinted mo chú chain in SG. i. 128, and mistranslated 'my gentle hound [and myself consequently],' ibid. II 140.

1584. Nocha raibi mísi riam . tuaidh na thes na thoir na thiar, Fr. 26.

1587—1592. IS misi 7 *tus*a ro adnaic he, cinco beith a fis acum [leg. acut?] .i. Cuindscleo m*ac* Gilla m*eic* Annscleo, m*ac* rig Brettan 7 Saxan 7 Frangc.' D*erg* cecinit:

where the first line is hypermetrical.

1596—1613. Cf. LL. 206ᵇ and Rev. Celt. VII. 290—296.

1613. is ferr duit na dul cen ní . a m*aic* Cumaill Almainí, Fr. 27ª.

1620. damalta: samalta, Fr. 27ª. Dam-alta (rendered by 'shades' in SG. II 141), literally 'ox-herds' (cf. altaib 'flocks', AU. 960) here metaphorically applied to the clouds of night. So the Vedic poets regard the clouds as the rain-making cows of the sky, and the stars as Rinder or Rinderheerde, Grassmann s. v. go.

1624, 1625. do innis . . . sin: do indis Cáilte d' fácbail leth amuich don tsidh, Fr. 27ª, 'he told (them) that Cáelte was left outside the elfmound'.

1626—1628. luid . . tsíd . doluidh D*erg* ar a cend, 7 tuc isin sid é, 7 tuc*ad* in nónb*ar* robuí ina farr*ad*, 7 tuc*ad* a cathair ngrind ngloinidhi ar laechlar an tsidha iat, Fr. 27ª.

1628. aimser: aes 7 uair, Fr. 27ª.

1629. Ilbreac: Aed Minbrecc, Fr. 27ª.

1645. a comraidh in sceith 'into the box of his shield', as O'Curry renders it, The Fate of the Children of Tuirenn, p. 231: see also ll. 319, 2373 . Comra usually means 'ark' or 'coffin'. Here it seems to signify the hollow of the boss (ὀμφαλός) in which the owner of the shield could keep a small rod, an ingot, or a chain: it certainly does not mean the 'rim' (bile, ἄντυξ), as in SG. II 108.

1653. no for dno, O. Ir. dono, occurs frequently in LL.

1657. a foirtcedh 7 a hincasnaidi: a fortci 7 a himtacfaind, Fr. 27ᵇ.

1660, 1710, 1722, Congha: Cnomga, Fr. 27ᵇ, 28ª.

1662, 1698, 1733 Midhna: Midgna, Fr. 27ᵇ, 28ª. Faillén m*ac* Fidhgha, R. 21ª 1.

1666. i lithlaithi na samhna gacha bliadhna: la cinnti gacha bli*adna*, R. 21ª 1.

1668. do séidedh . . . teinedh: ro imbolgad re nert anala in cairchi tened, Fr. 27ᵇ . do tséted a anáil 7 doligedh cóirthi ten*edh* asa bhél, R. 21ª 1.

1675. do bi ag gabháil oirb*er*ta air, R. 21ª 1.

1677. Feis na Temra. It seems from ll. 1680 and 5367 that the Feast of Tara lasted for six weeks, and during that time feuds were forbidden (l. 1680ª): cf. the sacred armistice (ἐκεχειρία) during the Olympic games.

1680. rathaigset: mothaighedar, Fr. 27ᵇ. The nine lines next after 1680 have been accidentally omitted in the marginal numbering. They will be referred to as 1680, a, b, c, d, e, f, g, h, i.

1680 a after mbliadna, Fr. 27ᵇ inserts .i. in mál mulletan, and R. 21ª 1: 7 máolmull*ach* leth*an* fair.

1680 b: Ro dhech: Ro midh 7 ro mór-dféch, Fr. 27ᵇ.

1700, 1703. uair etc. Uair roidb 'arna roguin, 7 mna re cuír lamna, 7 milid maithi mórm*en*mnacha 'arna luathledrad, ro coideoltais risin ceol sirbind sidhi, 7 risin ngothan nglesta nguthbind, ro canadh an fer sirrech*t*ach sidhi ticed do losc*ud* na Temr*ach* cecha bl*iadna*, Fr. 28ª.

1706. Cithrúadh m*ac* Aithairne on aos dána, R. 21ª 2.

1713. dibraicedh: teilged, Fr. 28ª.

1714. ghéba do lamh dheas: fogéba do lethlam des damsa tre bithu, Fr. 28ª.

1718. ben . . . cráisighi: boin-siu a coimét do iarand na sleigi, Fr. 28ª. bean a coimed d'iarann na sl*edh*e [leg. sl*egh*e], R. 21ᵇ 1.

1720. gráin: fidhrén, Fr. 28ª. In Lism. gráin na sleigi means 'the point of the spear', not 'the missile's horrific effect', SG. II 144: see note on l. 1726.

1723, 1724. a tigh Themra . . . Temra: a n-Er*inn*. Gab*ais* Find an sgiath 7 an tslegh, 7 adubairt Fiacha: 'mar itcluinfea tu an ceol sirrech*t*ach síghi [leg. sídhe] 7 in timpán tetbind 7 in fedan fuidhi fírbind déna a ndub*art* rit', ar Fiacha. Ocus ro cuimnigh Find iarsin a ndubairt Fiachna fris, Fr. 28ª.

1725—6. t*uc* Finn fograinne na sleidhe [leg. sleighe] neime réna édan, R. 21ᵇ 1. Here fograinne, like the forgrain of Lism., means 'spear-point', not 'dire energy', SG. II 144.

1737. ádhmar 'fortunate' 'lucky', not 'well-calculated', SG. II 144.

1739. lia 'flood' (.i. tuile, O'Cl.), not 'lump', SG. II 144.

1739—1751. Ocus . . . chuairt: co tainic a m*áthair* da indsaig*id* .i. Tudhcha banliaigh Abairchi, 7 atb*er*t Cáilte:

1740. ro chuir ar bír bodhba hé, R. 21[b] 1. cuaille badhbhdha a warlike stake' (not 'a pole of sinister significance', SG. II 144), i. e., the stake or pole on which the head of a slain enemy was fixed. Cf. Iliad XVIII 176: κεφαλὴν δέ σε θυμὸς ἀνώγει πῆξαι ἀνὰ σκολόπεσσι ταμόνθ' ἁπαλῆς ἀπὸ δειρῆς; and see R. Köhler, Kleinere Schriften i. 411, and Ralston, Russian Folktales, 93, 94, 181.

1744. Toirrche, a bainnliaig Amharrtha 'come hither, O she-leech of Amartha!' or Abairche, (not 'A lamentable case, O most admirable she-physician', SG. II 144). She is called Tudhcha banliaigh Abairchi in Fr. 28[b], and doubtless resembled Agamede, ἦ τόσα φάρμακα σίδη ὅσα τρέφει εὐρεῖα χθών, Iliad xi, 741.

1749. a Boirche 'out of (Benn) Boirche'.

1767. Luachair Degadh: Luachair Degha tiar, Fr. 28[b].

1769—1820. This story was edited and translated by O'Curry, Children of Tuirenn, pp. 231—233, where 'houses' is a misprint for 'hounds'.

1780, 1781. seitfedach . . . mhórslóig: in fothrom 7 in fidrén .i. teitimnech na téd 7 basgaire na n-ech 7 culgaire na carbat 7 glondbeimnech na sciath 7 drongair na luirech 7 taitim in morsluóigh, Fr. 29[a], Seitfedach na n-ech 'the snorting of the steeds' is misrendered by 'blowing of horns', in SG. II 145.

1780. séitf*ed*hach na n-ech 7 gíscánach na carpad, R. 21[b] 2.

1783—4. Truagh lim a ticfa dhesin, ar Aedh Minbreac, R. 21[b] 2.

1790—92. Ro soich treithirne tul*aigh* . re conairt 'con crobhcubhaigh,

R. 22[a] 1.

1802. do ghaánaibh bega biracha, R. 22[a] 1.

1803, 1804. ro cuired in cath co fergach fortrén feram*ail* 7 co lond leidmech lánlaidir o tosach in lae co tainic midi medoin lae 7 laithi, Fr. 29[a].

1810—1813. do tócaib Derg Dianscothach in sleigh, 7 tucustar sréo n-urchair co tarla tar ségh[l]aind a inair 7 tar brotlach a léned don cétfir, cor' tregd a craidi 'na clíab, 7 co ndeghbris a druim isin fir ba sia uada. Fr. 29[a].

1829. arbithin 'because of', not 'the rehabilitating of', SG. II 147. Findine: Finninne, R. 22[a] 2.

1834. The thumb denoted vigour in Wales and, probably, also in Ireland. That vigour combined with knowledge attains to truth seems the meaning of Find's symbolic action here and elsewhere. (203, 2408, 2607, 2662, 5416, 6627).

1837. The 'house' here mentioned was, of course, the monastery of Clonmacnois, founded in 548 by Ciarán macc in tsáir.

1838. Caílte: Find, Fr. 29[b].

1839—40. INmhain ceall fa comr*u*mach . bhías a foch*ur* na habhann, inmhain f*er*tan f*or*burach . b*us* adhlac*ad* mórcalann. R. 22[a]2.

1855. Sáilim: Ailim, R. 22[b] 1.

1862. nai cloidim inntláis órdhaidi 'nine swords of golden inlay', i. e. inlaid with gold, is rendered in SG. II 148 by 'nine long swords with hilt and guard of gold'. nai coin: ix. cuilíuin, R. 22[b] 1.

1864. an cath: le cách, Fr. 29[b], le cach, R. 22[b] 1.

1871—1873. in aenduine da n-indsaig*id* .i. bathlach ruagh [leg. bachlach rúadh-] moel rindtach, 7 cend carrach cnocremar, 7 bánsuile mora a n-iarthar cind in bathlaig [leg. bachlaig], 7 srón odhar édigh attm*ar* aigi, 7 ba samalta re maelcladh coicrichi hí, 7 fiarfaigit scela da céile. Cia thusa, a óclaich? ar in bathlach [leg. bachlach] fria Cáilte. Don Feind mísi, ar se. Fr. 29[b], 30[a].

1876. Becnait: Beccoc, Fr. 30[a], Becan, R. 22[b] 2. — a good example of the interchange of diminutives.

1878. is slan .xxx. bl*iadan* duinn araen, Fr. 30[a].

1883. Cidh ro dhighbadh: Cid ro díth 7 ro dighbaidh, Fr. 30[a]. Crét ro dhib*aidh*, R. 22[b] 2.

1884. ro mhill sinn 'who ruined us', is misrendered by 'whom Finn ruined' in SG. ii. 148. (In SG. i. 135 sinn is misprinted Fionn).

1885. comlana: comslana do bhí agum, R. 22[b] 2.

1893. After Eogan R. 22[b] 2 has: Luidset le Eog*an* isin dun.

1899, 1900. triur ann .i. an t-ath*air* 7 a ing*en* 7 a chú .i. onchu gerr glas, R. 22[b] 2.

1907. cu ro loingi: co ro loinged, Fr. 30[a] . co ro loinge, R. 23[a] 1.

1917. tricha goin o hinn a hordan go a erla fair, R. 23[a] 1.

1918. After air, Fr. 30[a] has: 7 ro *ch*ruadhaigh Maelan m*ac* Mongaigh a comrac, co ro fortamlaigh ar Cáilte co mor isin comrac sin.

1920. urgranna: imgerra, Fr. 30[b].

1932. Ocus: IS and sin, Fr. 30[b]. taisi is rendered by 'dimness in SG. II 150. It means weakness, softness.

1939. Cuillend-ros na Féinne, 'the Holly-wood of the Fíann', is misprinted cúillios na Féinne in SG. i. 150, and misrendered by 'the Fianna's rear-fort', ibid. II 150.

1946, 1947. bruinne . . . uime: 7 léne do sroll rigda fria cnes 7 inar maeth sroill tairis amuigh, Fr. 30[b].

1955—1958. 'Ro ba maith t'athair', ar Cáilte, 7 itbert:
Rob é in brighach buan bladhm*ar* . rob é an feindigh fircalma, rob é in craeb toraidh co mblaid . ac foghail tsét in domain. Fr. 30[b].
In 1957 brighach 'vigorous' is misrendered by 'disdainful' in SG. II 150.

1964, 1969, 1980, 1991. dithre: dithrib, Fr. 30ᵇ.

1968. scithlim (better scichlim) is rendered by 'a debility' in SG. II 151. It rather means 'a vanishing'.

1969, 1972, 1978. Muc Smaile, not Mac Smaile, as in SG. II 137.

1985. toluibh: codnaib, Fr. 31ᵃ.

1989. scenmdha, better spelt scenbda in LL. 108ᵃ 48, is derived from scenb LL. 88ᵃ 44, 114ᵃ 42. Whatever it means, it certainly is not 'ubiquitous', as in SG. II 151.

1990. Here Lism. omits the second half-quatrain:

sec*ht* treghdtai mſle*d* tar magh[1] . isin arm re himbual*ad*, Fr. 31ᵃ.

1994. Here in Fr. 31ᵃ ends the poem, the whole of which R. omits.

1999, 3033, 6155, 6165, 7085. éraic, anglicised eric, 'were-gild', ποινή, in the Acallam always means compensation for death wrongfully caused. In Niam's case, 3031, the amount of the compensation was fixed by three arbitrators, one of whom was a woman.

2012. fialnár: fíal náirech, R. 23ᵇ 1.

2020. deich cét: xxx. Fr. 31ᵃ.

2021. a ráidhemne: an faistine, Fr. 31ᵃ.

2024. as é ro oileasdar mhé: mh' oidi tairisi, Fr. 31ᵃ. iss é romalt, R. 23ᵇ 1.

2025. tóthacht, rendered by 'reversion' in SG. II 152, rather means 'property': see tothacht in Wind. Wörterb. 'though he has the kingship, 'tis I that have the property in it', i. e. the right to it.

2030. Ro thaimhsen: ro taispén, Fr. 31ᵃ.

2040. Carn Gairbh daire: Carnn Duibh doire, R. 23ᵇ 2.

2050. dorigned uball ion rendaib de 'an apple round spearpoints was made of him' — a kenning for a corpse pierced by many spears.

2057. The practice of burying armour with its owner (doubtless for his use in the other world) prevailed in Ireland as elsewhere. See infra 2076 and 3175.

2068. tab*air* proinn c*ét gach* lái da m*uintir*, R. 24ᵃ 1.

2074—5. 'The cairn was dug up and Garb daire was found therein with his arms, and Lug mac Ethlenn's chain was found'. The words 'Gaire cona airmgaisced and 7 frith' are omitted in SG. i. 140, though plainly in Lism. 173ᵃ 1.

2078. tulaig sin: tslúogh, Fr. 31ᵇ.

2082. do naemPatraic: do rí Érenn no do Pa*traic* da tigernda fein, Fr. 31ᵇ.

ro muired: ro dunadh, R. 24ᵃ 1.

2090. in tres inadh 'one of the three places.'

[1] madh, Fr.

2094. irgairdiugud menman 'an amusing of the spirit'. Derived from gairit 'short', as Cymr. di-fyrwch from byr.

2097. iiii. ix. traig: sec*ht* . xx. traighed, Fr. 31ᵇ 2.

2098. ocht traigthi . xx.: . xx . traighed, Fr. 32ᵃ.

2101. in cethramad ben is ferr 'one of the four best women'. laighestar: loigh, Fr. 32ᵃ, Lism. 173ᵃ 2.

2109. co taite n-imbuilg: co luan taite n-imbuilc, Lism. 173ᵃ 2, where the transported n is wrong. After n-imbuilg, Fr. 32ᵃ has: 7 ba hé seiscend a aighide*chta* an cé*t*adhaig a rogha, etc.

2110. R. 24ᵃ 2 adds: ag tige*r*na nó ag bainntige*r*na oile.

2111. do gheibedh uaithi a lórdhaethain, Lism. 173ᵃ 2.

2113. ro ailestar: tuargaib, Fr. 32ᵃ.

2114. ní raibi bancomalta, Lism. 173ᵃ 2, not 'banchomdalta' as in SG. i. 140.

2116. deoin: ced, Fr. 32ᵃ = O. Ir. cet 'permission'.

3033. Fixing the amount of a penalty by the weight of the person injured is an interesting piece of popular jurisprudence. In Montesquieu's time, if the students of Pisa on St. Catharine's day caught a Jew in the streets, they weighed him and made him pay his weight in sweetmeats, The Quarterly Review, July 1899, p. 55. Compare 5693, where the bride-price of a fairy princess is similarly determined, and note that still in India a rájá sometimes gives his weight in gold to Brahmans. It would be rash to cite Iliad XXII 351 — οὐδ' εἴ κεν σ'αὐτὸν χρυσῷ ϝερύσασθαι ἀνώγῃ Δαρδανίδης Πρίαμος — as proof that some similar practice existed in western Asia.

3035. atorchair: dorochair, Fr. 41Aa.

3466. riam reime: na cléirig, Lism. 181ᵃ 1.

3475, 7750. With St. Patrick's blessings on minstrels and minstrelsy cf. Odyssey VIII. 479—481:

πᾶσι γὰρ ἀνθρώποισιν ἐπιχθονιοισιν ἀοιδοί τιμῆς ἔμμοροί εἰσι καὶ αἰδοῦς, οὕνεκ' ἄρα σφέας οἵμας μοῦς' ἐδίδαξε, φίλησε δὲ φῦλον ἀοιδῆν.

3478. The honour of being a king's bedfellow (fer leptha rig) is mentioned also in 7752. Ossian was Cáilte's bedfellow for seventeen years (2467). As to Find's bedfellows, see 2206, 2789. Cf. Stevenson's Catriona, c. 6.

3479. soirbius dóib: aenfer do cét a n-ifr*inn* dib, 7 nem doib ina ndán 7 ina n-eladain, Fr. 46ᵃ.

3489. A 'staff of white hazel' is mentioned also in 7601. It doubtless had some significance in Irish folklore. St. Senán dug a well with a stake of hazel. St. Maedóc's mother held a hazel distaff when she was bringing him forth.

3490. genuflexion (or perhaps prostration) to St. Patrick is constantly mentioned: see 876, 2260, 3712, 4457, 5378, 5391, 6396, 7829.

3493. atclos duind: itcualamar, Fr. 46ᵃ.

3495. bishop Soichell, called Patrick's 'chief spencer', is not one of the twenty-four members of the saint's household, who are mentioned in the Tripartite Life, pp. 264, 266. He is probably identical with Sachell bp. of Caissel Mór, ibid. pp. 108, 304, 319, 337.

After l. 3495, Fr. 46ᵃ has: Ca haghaid in aghaid ano*cht*? ar Eogan ardbrugaid. R. 35ᵃ has Ca hag*aid* ano*cht*? ar Eog*an*.

3725. Here Fr. 48ᵇ has the tale of Aed, son of Eochaid Redside, infra 4080—4100. The tale of Clidna is in Fr. 19ᵃ.

3733, 3803. Imdeirg: Airmdeirg, R. 37ᵃ.

3734. in t-éscca ina chuiced dég 'the moon in her fifteenth (day).' i. e. the full moon. The corresponding passage in Lism. 182ᵇ 2 is ésca ina ollchoiged déc, which is misrendered in SG. II 198 by 'the moon in her twelve provinces'. Cf. LL. 265ᵇ 48: samalta ra ésca 'na ollchóiciud déc a gnúis, 'her face resembled the moon in her great fifteenth (day)'; cf. too, the Homeric hymn to the moon: ἐσσυμένως προτέρωσ' ἐλάσῃ καλλίτριχας ἵππους, ἐσπερίη διχόμηνος, ὅτε πλήθῃ μέγας ὄγκος, λαμπρόταταί τ' αὐγαὶ τότ' ἀεξομένης τελέθωσιν οὐρανόθεν.

3735. ardrennachaib: rétlannaib, Lism. 182ᵇ 2.

3744. 'a high-prowed, sword-straight boat of bronze.' For colgdíriuch SG. i. 106 has cóil[deiridh], and the passage is misrendered thus: 'a high-prowed currach having a narrow stern of copper', SG. II 198.

3745. phutairle: phudhairle, R. 37ᵃ.

3751. in tibreadh cumaid don churach dho? Lism. 183ᵃ 1. cf. a n-aenleapaid riut 7 a n-aen-chumaid infra 4106. An tibrad sibh leaba luinge don tí doberadh cungnum éoluis dáibh? R. 37ᵃ.

3786. 'Land of Promise' (also in 5226) is one of the names for the Irish Elysium.

3787. co Loch lúachra ('lake of rushes') dú a mbái cathair Mhanannáin, R. 37ᵇ. The Loch Luchra of Laud and Lism. is rendered in SG. II 99 by 'loch of the pigmies', which surely is not the meaning.

3793. cruite nuabinde náethétacha 'fresh-melodious, nine-stringed harps'. naethétach = ἐννεάχορδος, not 'dulcet-chorded', as in SG. II 200.

3810. Fr. 20ᵇ and R. 37ᵇ add hé.

3815. gái chró: gaithi cró, Fr. 20ᵇ. gáithe cró na genmn*aigechta* 7 br*á*enan na maisi do luighe for*r*a, R. 37ᵇ. gai cró na genmnaidechta literally 'the deadly pang of chastity', is rendered in SG. II 200 by 'pernicious effects of continence'.

3821. barr uachtar: midhua*ch*tar, Fr. 20ᵇ.

luidedur reompo: seoluit rompa, Lism. 183ᵃ 2.

3824. For chluiche Laud 130ᵇ, has chluithe, R. 37ᵇ adds: docum na *t*rágha. The sport perhaps resembled the surf-riding of the Pacific islanders.

3831. Illathach: Illdathach, Fr. 20ᵇ. Ildathach, Lism. 183ᵇ 1.

3833—3852. This poem is also in the Rennes Dindsenchas, 104ᵇ 1.

3834. iss e sin gidh garbh in gairbh . in ní dá *t*ar*l*a in senainm, R. 38ᵃ.

3969. túsca: taisci, Fr. 23ᵇ.

3978. gotha should probably be corrected to gothán, a diminutive of guth.

4080. The description (tuaruscbail) of Aed in Fr. 48ᵇ is worth quoting: Ni himchian ro bat*ar* and co facat*ar* in aenoclach n-óc n-allata da n-indsaig*id*, 7 léne do sroll rígh ria g*r*ian a chnis, 7 inar maeth sroill tairis amuigh ane*ch*tair, *con*a uchtclar órdaigi *co n*gebed ón gualaind co seitci dó, 7 se mín mullach-lethan, 7 sé aigim abratgorm, 7 .l. erla deghbuidi on cluais co céli dó, 7 bindithir re tedaib mendcrot i lámaib suad oc a sírseinm fosgad a gotha 7 urlab*ra* in m*a*caim . sciath co tuaghmílaib d*e*rgóir fair, 7 da sleigh coicrindi ina laim, 7 cloigem [leg. cloideb] orduirnd indtlais ima bragaid fa comfada re clár do luing lebair ar lanfaide hé.

4085. After thes, Fr. 48ᵇ has: ingine Dobráin Dubthaire.

4090. in da mnai: da i*ngin* maela, Fr. 49ᵃ. doríacht*atur* da ingin mháola, R. 38ᵇ.

4096. After faichthi, Fr. 49ᵃ has: ferglais, co saine édaigh ce*ch*a datha im ce*ch* m*a*cam ocaind.

4098. am rith ón brug: im śighi [leg. śidhi] 7 im sirrith o faithchi in brogha, Fr. 49ᵃ.

4103. ann 7 mainchesa do gabail ann: indtib, manaig 7 mainchesa do gabail ann, Fr. 49a, 'to acquire monks and nuns therein.' In SG. II 205 mainchesa is rendered by 'benefactions to the Church.' R. 38b has: 7 mainchesa d'fag*ail* úadh.

4106. a n-aen-chumaid 'in the one berth' (not 'in the one condition', SG. II 205): see note on l. 3751. cumaid perhaps for cubaid, cogn. with Lat. cubo?

4114, 4115. ar in tuaith os fert*us* blai . is fud ata sí abus, Fr. 49a.

4123. Carnn na curad: Caill na cu*r*adh, Fr. 49a.

4134. Eochaid: Eoch*aid* Doimlen, Fr. 49a.

4156. ní taispenann sin soinenn na suba dam, Fr. 49b. ni thaimsenann sáimhe ná subhaighe damsa, Lism. 184b 1.

4170. tubhaig: tsub*aigh*, Lism. 184b 1: toraid, Fr. 49b.

4173. garb-thanach 'rough washing' is rendered by 'cruel burial' in SG. II 205, 206. But the tanach (better tonach, root nig) means the washing of the two girls' corpses in the ford, see the Boroma, Rev. Celt. XIII. 38, 124. The Greeks, too, washed their corpses: Iliad 18, 350: Odyssey 24, 44, Eurip. Phoen. 1319, 1667 1, and the Romans: Verg. Aen. VI 218.

4180. soithim: soithimh, Lism. 184b 1. For férbrug gabala indimoccus, Fr. 49b has: fer bruit glancor*cra* i n-athfoc*us*.

4194. umal-ósaic lit. 'humble feetwashing' (ósaic borrowed from obsequium). Paraphrased in SG. II 207: 'where with all reverence they were ministered to.' Cf. 5033, 5059, 5528, 5668 and Lism. Lives, pp. 326, 392.

4200. ro bói: do bhí maraen fris, Lism. 184b 2.

4203. After fair, Fr. 50 has: 7 da crotha urtlach do cnoib cendcorcra caille fair con anfadais a n-imairib 7 a n-etrighib an fuilt findclechtaigh forordha bai fair.

4208. cora: curob, Lism. 184b 2.

4424. annsin: 7 is ed tacmaingid . uii . xxx . cét, all 7 eas 7 abaind 7 madhreigh [leg. maghreidh], Fr. 50. 'and 'tis this they surround, seven cantreds, cliff and cataract, river and plain.' ἐρχοθηρευτική was well understood in ancient Ireland.

4428. línta: línta fiad*aig*, Lism. 185a 1: cf. ἀγροτέρους λίνα, Theocr. 8, 58.

4432. réo n-urchuir: rot n-urchair, Lism. 185b 1.

4437. Druim ndeirg: Druim derg, Fr. 50.

4458—59. 7 Cailte . . . fair: 7 an gérait aingceoil 7 in tlam tuathail [leg. tuachail?] ro bai ac milled a maithi*usa* 7 a arba do tuitim le Cáilte in less aile, Fr. 51.

4465. 'the stone on which the Fiann used to grind their weapons on samain (Nov. 1.) every year' is mentioned also in 4196. The grinding was probably some kind of religious or magical observance.

4466. After bliadna: Fr. 51 has: 7 ní claechlaidis na faebair doberdis orra i cath nó a cleith nó a comlann.

4469—4472. For similar legends see Cormac s. v. ána, and the story of Frodi in Saxo Grammaticus.

4473. dochuadar as na riga sin 'those kings departed (this life)'. So bebais 'he went' in Fél. Oeng. qrol. 95, Feb. 18, means 'he died'.

4474. ro thuit Cairpre i cath Gabra: ro scaigh Cairp*ri* Lifechair a sen-Gabar i crich*aib* Ua-Morc, risi raiter Ua *Con*aill Gabra, Fr. 51.

4480. deibidach: deibereadhach, Lism. 185a 2, (misprinted deinmnedach in SG. i. 185) seems a 'contamination' of deibedach and deifireach, both words meaning 'hasty'.

4490. A Coscraigh, in aithnidh in lia . cos' t[ath]aighed an righnía', Fr. 51.

4502. mo dimda: m'ail 7 m'airbire, Fr. 51.

4505. Fae: Fedha, Fr. 51.

4515. co ti tú: co tís, Lism. 185a 2.

4518. Walking round a certain stone desel 'righthandwise' will ensure victory to the king of Leinster, see Lismore Lives 348.

4526, 4527. Tipraid na Sciathserci, R. 39a 1.

4528. Scathderc: Sciathserc, R. 39a 1.

4528, 4546, 4562. The smirdris or smeirdris (smirgrís, R. 39a 1) of Loch Lurgan must have been a water-monster, like the muirdris of Loch Rudraige, Laws I. 73. The translation 'bramble-bush' in SG. II 210, 211, seems a bad guess. The smer- may possibly be cognate with Gr. σμαρίς and NHG. schmerle.

4532. ic lethnachud: oc lethadh, Fr. 52a.

4533—37. This strange tale seems the tradition of an ancient attempt to drain a lake or swamp.

4537. Fr. 52a adds: co nach mó na inad aenindsi ata ar marthain.

4551. ceth*ri* meic righ Cailli in cosnuma, Fr. 52a.

'swelling', ibid. 116, 'plaintive', ibid. 143, 'cozening', ibid. 221, 'bewitching', ibid. 187, 'enticing', ibid. 236, sirrechtach síde 'superlatively sweet', ibid. 116, 'marvellous magic', ibid. 213. Of these guesses, only the first is right. For -rechtach is obviously derived from recht 'a fury', 'a fit', LL. 300b, Rev. Celt. IX 456, XIII 66, 123: an-recht LL. 314b 12. This may come from repto-*, cognate with Lat. rapio, rapto and Gr. ἑρέπτομαι (fresse, eig. rupfe ab, Lidén), Alb. rjep ziehe aus ab, beraube. The meaning of sír-rechtach would then be ever-enrapturing, -rapturous, -entrancing.
